Measles shots now required

By Kip Fry

For the second year, new students at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln must be immunized for measles.

The Nebraska Medical Association recently announced that outbreaks of measles on college campuses account for about 20 percent of reported cases. Young adults who have not been vaccinated with a live virus vaccine probably are not protected from the disease.

The Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta recommended that colleges and universities install an inoculation policy, after studies showed the high percentage of measles cases on college campuses.

While there is no specific deadline for the shots, students who have not turned in proof of vaccination by Sept. 15 will be mailed a reminder, said Gerald Fleischli, medical director of the University Health Center. After Oct. 15, a $25 fee will be charged and another letter will be sent. The policy specifically affects freshmen and transfer students.

Students who do not respond by the end of the semester will have their grades withheld until they do, Fleischli said.

Last year, UNL administration held the grades of 17 students, Fleischli said. However, they all eventually complied, he said.

"The response this year is even better compliance, because people know that we mean it," Fleischli said.

Students must give the health center proof of the month and year of their last measles inoculation, Fleischli said.

The health center provides shots for $20.

"This (plan) will broaden the perspective for competitiveness," Liberty said. "We were the only state to offer this."

US West operates extensive research projects, Baca said. NU would play a large part in the new research facility, connecting professors and students with the large corporation for research in the technical sciences.

Rowson said university officials have known that emphasizing research would be a plus not only for the university, but for Nebraska as well.

Baca said that a proposal such as Orr's could be a deciding factor in locating the research facility.

"It's good that states' governments are recognizing the importance of research and the importance of competitiveness," Baca said. "It's heartening to see that the state of Nebraska is willing to put such an effort into research and education."
