On The Walls and the Stalls

Writing off the walls

By Amy Edwards
 and James M. Lillis
 Staff Reporter

Reading the stalls of Oldfather Hall's restrooms can be like deciphering the lyrics of an R.E.M. song — the words have been sanded over so many times that they appear to be some sort of art form.

Or perhaps the walls are only being prepared for repainting.

Students who have spent the last few years of their college careers at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln writing their most important thoughts on bathroom walls, favorite buildings and sidewalks $400 to $500. Maintenance workers just finished repainting the restrooms at Richards Hall, where the walls were covered with so much graffiti that the original color of the walls was indiscernible, Delhay said.

The worst part of graffiti cleanup, Delhay said, is that it takes valuable time and money away from more important maintenance jobs.

Cleaning a sidewalk is both dangerous and time-consuming, he said. Two to four hours must be spent with an airless spray gun containing paint thinner. Delhay said the paint thinner sends up a cloud of flammable gas that would explode if someone walked by with a lit cigarette.

Delhay said more than $1,000 was spent in the past two months destroying the "works of art."

may be slightly dismayed to find them missing.

The walls of the stalls are virtually free of everything but fresh paint in Richards Hall and Woods Art Building. The tiles are clean in Andrews and Bennett halls. The basement of Richards Hall appears to be one of the last remaining bastions of proper, improper and creative graffiti.

While students may be amused by sayings like "Holy leotards, Batman! I tore mine!" the cost of repainting is expensive.

Jerry Delhay, UNL maintenance manager, estimated that the cost of repainting one bathroom costs body," Delhay said. "I doubt it's the faculty running around defacing expensive building surfaces."

Delhay said maintenance personnel probably will never get rid of all the illicit artwork at UNL.

Desks in Love Library Auditorium still carry students' favorite slogans, bands and Greek symbols, plus the usual counterattacks from those who don't agree.

Some restroom stalls continue to tell everyone who uses them that "John Loves Beth." And somewhere someone named Sue is probably heartbroken because the entire campus knows that she "eats bugs."
