Loss not comparable to prices in Vegas

We never found Elvis. "Earl" did sneak up in the balcony at the Hilton long enough to see Wayne Newton tell a bad ethnic joke, but then he got kicked out by a weightlifter in a white tux.

Luckily, the six of us only lost $700. That's more than any of us ever see in a month or two, and the approximate GNP of many small Third World nations, but let's keep things in proper perspective. At the Neimann-Marcus discount outlet, just down the block from Caesar's Palace, right there in the middle of the Strip, 700 bucks won't even get you both parts of an alpaca-fur bikini, so it's not like we lost all that much.

Unfortunately for us, however, it was all we had. And so, like the gentle old woman in the parable, after giving all we had, we set off for Los Angeles with nothing but hope, prayer and a Texaco card.

I could tell you of the things we did in the City of Angels. I could tell you of the fun we had. I could tell you how we saw Chuck Norris hacking out his new movie on the Santa Monica Pier. I could tell you how we ate at All-America Burger, where Brad from "Fast Times at Ridgemont High" worked. I could tell you how truly grateful the six of us were that Texaco stations in every Western state sell beer and burritos, and what that diet does to your health after a week, but these are other stories, to be told another time. My grandchildren won't believe me, and like every generation in its youth, they'll probably have to go and find out the evils of life for themselves.

I'd wish them luck, but that's what every dealer in Vegas told us.

Pretension: what L.A.'s all about

Everyone in L.A. seems to be lost, still searching for something to be found in the subtropical heat that never existed in their homes in the Midwest or back East. In the immortal words of U2, they still haven't found what they're looking for. And as you watch the people driving to nowhere, stopping in suburbs that blend together, try to overlook the futility of it all and enjoy the sights.

Pretension is what L.A. is all about. Everyone is living out a fantasy here, so there's no point in trying to analyze the place. Just get in the car and become a voyeur.

Drive down to the heart of Hollywood to witness the epitome of the California dreamer: Angelyne. Angelyne is a bleach-blonde glamour girl who always wanted to be a star, but she had no connections and no talent, so her boyfriend spent $50,000 and had her likeness painted on the side of one of Hollywood's few tall buildings. Although Angelyne finally landed a role in the film "Earth Girls Are Easy," she has been famous for absolutely nothing the past two years.

The main thing you will notice about Hollywood is that it is hardly the pristine dream mecca people say it is. Hollywood is somewhat dirty and sordid, but it's supposed to be that way, isn't it? Cruise down Hollywood Boulevard and witness the infamous hookers — would-be Angelynes with no talent — who came to Tinseltown to become stars, but didn't have the 50 grand needed to put up billboards of themselves.

Amble along the Walk of Fame and witness apotheosis personified: star-shaped cement shrines of celebrities who were famous enough to have their names dropped on the sidewalk for eternity. Who needs gossip columns with names dropped in boldface
