

Athlete, non-athlete — all must work for an education

know what sacrifice is. My doctor bills prove it.

But what one must remember throughout this futile debate is that athletes, especially on the collegiate level, participate by choice. Sure, scholarships help with school's many expenses, but if that's why the individual participates in a certain sport, complaints about lifting weights at incommensurate hours of the morning shouldn't be made.

Athletes here at Nebraska do work hard and should be given much-deserved credit for their efforts. But non-athlete students work just as hard — often much harder.

"Some non-athletes may view our sports as fun and 'recreational,'" the same letter went on to say. "But to us, it's much like a job — with an extreme amount of physical and mental drain."

Hey, there's a simple solution — quit. If Husker athletes don't like conditioning before the sun comes up or tedious practices after a long, hard day of classes — which, for some athletes I know, is a novelty — they shouldn't do it anymore. If they don't like what they're getting in return for playing games they love, they should do everything possible to dispose of their woe.

My advice to these poor, misunderstood athletes is to go out and get a job (or two) and work 40 or 50 hours a week to pay for their education, room, food and books. Give school a try, like the rest of us, without the luxury of free tutors, academic counselors and vacations from classes on those long road trips.

And compare the glamour of bus-ing tables to having fans cheer for your team and chant your name.

Of course, some of the lesser-recognized sports — such as cross country, swimming, track and wrestling — aren't as noticed among Husker sports fans, and many of these athletes have a more justifiable argu-ment.

But the bottom line is this: Ath-letes have it a lot better than some of them seem to think. If that isn't enough, they should try something other than athletics. UNL's support of the Pell Grant's higher priority for student-athletes only provides fur-ther support of the "pampered ath-letes" allegations.

Husker athletes work hard, and so do other UNL students. But when athletes have a chance to get even more through higher Pell Grant pri-orities simply because they play a sport and can't have a job, someone's not working as hard as they should.

erie Goodwin-Colbert, and she's done a super job," Beck said. "They have had major upsets at Colorado and Kansas State. Their only loss was to Missouri, so they've had a great first half."

Beck said she has been impressed by Oklahoma forward Jo Mosely, who leads the Sooners with a scoring average of 15.2 points per game. She said she has also been impressed by point guard Margaret McKeon, who is an "excellent penetrator."

Beck said the Huskers must contain Mosely and McKeon because the game against Oklahoma is impor-tant.

"It becomes one of the biggest of the year," she said. "When you are 4-0 in the conference and in contention for the conference title, it becomes an extremely important road game."
