to worry, having reduced his state of being to a simple three letter affirmation of the id. He is Sam and Sam he is.

In the other corner is the heavy-weight. We don't know his name. We just know he doesn't like green eggs and ham. The reason: he doesn't like them, that's all.

And with this, the battle is engaged. Sam-I-Am, representing the new wave of possibilities in the form of green eggs and ham versus the old establishment who will not accept new ideas just because they differ.

The establishment won't even meet Sam's demands halfway. The poor little guy is even willing to compromise. But although he tries to sweeten the setting with the opportunity to eat in a house, with a mouse, in a box, in the rain, with a goat, on a boat, the stodgy old cuss still declares that he would not or could not eat them, just because — he doesn't like them.

He refuses to meet Sam-I-Am halfway. Instead, he just grows more and more vehement, until the inevitable climax occurs. Based on nothing more than his own personal dislikes, the enemy's arguments sink into the whirlpool of unreasonable prejudice. Finally, all wet, he timidly agrees to try to eat the green eggs and ham. And guess what? Barriers down, HE LIKES THEM! Hey, Mikey! Think of all the trouble that could have been avoided had our friend simply tried something new. But instead, he closed his mind and nearly caused the deaths of a mouse fox, and goat, not to mention the passengers of a train and boat!

Imagine the trouble he must have getting laid.

Happily, however, through "Green Eggs," Seuss shows us that, if we just open our minds and hearts to the numerous possibilities our world has to offer in the forms of different-looking food objects, all will be peace and harmony. We may of course need stomach pumps after partaking of too many green eggs and ham slices (no one in the book seems to realize that the green food may indicate mold), but compared to buying the world a Coke and teaching it to sing, what's a little food poisoning among friends?

'Police Academy 5' is a U.S. masterpiece

ROGER: Well Gene, it's Oscar time and it's just a shame that "Police Academy 5" wasn't released in time to be considered for the 87's. "P.A. 5" is the engrossing new film from the auteurs responsible for Police Academy's 1-4.

police officer obviously portraying the Oliver North role, says "so you're saying it's okay to break the law if you have a good reason... like a note from your Mom or doctor or something..." Beautiful mimicry. Not since Kubrick's political-sociological study, "Dr. Strangelove," has there been a social commentary this poignant, this black, this rich.

in the theater obviously is indicative that the common theater-goer lacks appreciation of true art forms. But, if I may say so, your pompous analysis of this film is off-target. Certainly this is director Alan Myerson's statement on the twilight of the Reagan Presidency. Lassard is the humble, perhaps bumbling commander christened with greatness. Davis, being the hardcore Machiavellian that he is, wants see this philosopher-king and a new prince put in power, namely himself. They lack that this 78 year old gentle giant says that the mental capacity to lead his troops. But Lassard is the hero of the film. In the end, he is given free rein to continue as commander-in-chief until he wants to step down. This is Myerson's bold climax, stating obviously that America needs to strike down the 22nd Amendment so that Reagan may carry forth his glorious reign and continue showering his thunderous vision upon all Americans until he "just says NO!"

GENE: Roger, I'm afraid I didn't quite see it like that. This is a multifaceted film that shouldn't be confined to a single interpretation. The plot structure and Lassard recall the rotary construction of Euripides' "Medea". The Commandant is a sort of anti-Medea. His blessed incompetence is his success just as Medea's cut-throat schemes are hers.

Roger, its been a long time since I've seen a film that's reunited me with my cultural foundations like "Police Academy 5." There's a big difference between seeing a good film and having a film experience. "Police Academy 5" is a film experience of the first order. It evokes that nexus between a man and that intangible part of him that runs like a thread through each of us, tying us to our primordial ancestors.

GENE: Roger, I'm not contending your interpretation of the film. I respect you as a critic. I think you do a wonderful job in relating to your fellow common man.

ROGER: Gene, the lack of numbers

Film Analysis

In this thrilling sequel, Commandant Lassard is named Police Officer of the decade. The dastardly Captain Davis, seeking to usurp the commandant's position releases information that Lassard has passed mandatory retirement age. Before packing the gold watch in, Lassard flies to Miami Beach to accept his award. Meanwhile, the Governor's aide from TV's "Benson" steals the prized diamonds from the local museum. The plot thickens when the "Benson" guy mistakes the commandant's bag, which contains a goldfish, for his own, which contains the diamonds. His mission is to get the diamonds back at all costs. The rest of the story revolves around this search.

This celluloid masterpiece is a biting analogy of the final days of the Reagan Presidency. From the onset there is no doubt. One character, a women. The talk was sponsored by PUC's Sermons and Topics Committee.

"Premarital sex is a mistake, and I should know," the mother of God told the assembled gathering.

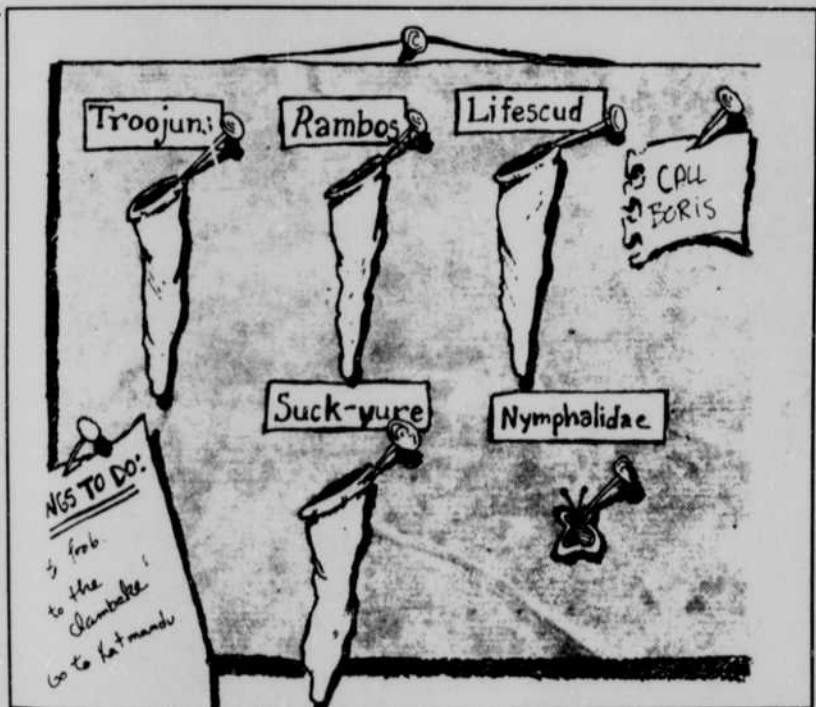

"I don't care who he is, the captain of the football team, the cute guy in geometry, or the Lord God Almighty. If he loves you, he'll give a ring," she said.

"Sometimes you'll be afraid not to say no," she said. "Maybe he won't love you anymore, or strike you with a lightning bolt. But this doesn't show what kind of man he is. Do you really want to love an entity like this?"

Mary said that after her pregnancy became public, she lost the respect of her community. In addition, God refused to pay any kind of child support. Mary refused to discuss the matter further, saying it was still under litigation.

The Blessed Virgin said she realizes some students will engage in sexual activity.

"If you do, for God's sake, use a condom," she said. "When I think of all the problems that could have been avoided if I had simply took some precautions, I could just cry."

They used to be almost strictly a male status symbol — young men carried them in back pocket wallets in anticipation of that coming of age.

Today, responsible men and women alike consider them to be standard issue for their social encounters. In an age where the condom market is expanding, the consumer has to grow with it. For that reason, the Daily Half-asskin provides the results of an informal preference poll of the men and women on our staff. Troojuns and Rambos brands were equally popular among men and women. Their exotic and sensual marketing and the powerful images their names conjure have thrust them into a significant role in any romantic interlude. Many of the men said that they liked these brands because of their long tradition for quality. The latex seems to be denser than other brands and that they fit snugly without the bagginess and chaffing associated with cheaper brands. However, men with larger donges complained that these brands become uncomfortable to wear after prolonged use.

Women liked them because they are available in lubricated and ribbed forms, but complained that their opaque color makes them kind of boring to look at.

Brands such as Lifescud and Suck-yure were first choice among the women. They are packaged smaller and lighter, making them easier to carry discreetly. Also, they come in a rainbow of fun colors. Men who had tried these brands said that they were light and comfortable, yet stood up well under pressure.

One staff member said he uses all-natural membrane condoms exclusively. He said that they are three to five times as expensive as latex condoms, but for fit and sensitivity they are superior to their latex cousins. He said that with proper cleaning and care, they can be used several times.

"That's the frosting on the cake," he said.

Easter Bunny boycott

By Muck Raker
Staff Reporter

In unprecedented clash of events, the Easter Bunny announced Wednesday that he would not be delivering Easter eggs to children in Washington, D.C.

Thursday afternoon, during a ceremonial photo gathering on the Black House lawn, a loud, boisterous debate broke out between the Easter Bunny and Vice President Boy George Tush, who was quoted as saying that the rabbit's challenges to the Republican party's front-runner stemmed from the rabbit having a "wild hare up his ass."

MTV's Kurt Loiter also reported that Tush had made unethical statements about "rabbit droppings," and that he did not like the idea of a rabbit challenging his political views.

"If bunnies were born to be in office, they wouldn't have big ears," he said. "You don't see anybody listening to me around here, do you?"

Tush reportedly stomped off the stage at that point and refused to answer questions from the press regarding an anonymous remark to the effect that the Easter Bunny had a better documented knowledge of foreign affairs.

After hopping across stage to shake hand and paw, the Easter Bunny turned to photographers for a few shots. When asked if he was insulted that Tush had left without parting in a handshake, the rabbit said he had "no hard feelings," but wished that the vice president would "act like the public figure he is and display proper etiquette."

When asked if he felt he had won the debate, the Easter Bunny only smiled before being escorted offstage by secret police.

The Easter Bunny so far has not proven a threat to Tush in the Republican Party nomination, taking only Rhode Island and Disneyland in the caucuses.

However, after Tush's remarks were made public, the Easter Bunny announced his boycott of the nation's capitol city.

"It's nothing personal against the inhabitants of Washington, D.C.," he said. "I just don't want to hop around in the same city as that jerk."
