tions," he said. "It's pretty close to total confusion at this time."

The Associated Press reported that Iran has demanded that the U.S. withdraw from the area, but Forsythe said he doesn't look for that to happen in the near future.

"It would appear to be caving in to Iran," he said. "It may be in the long-term this incident will lead us to review our policies."

Forsythe said if U.S. forces did withdraw, a United Nations peacekeeping force might take its place.

Forsythe said that whether reparations should be paid also depends on the investigation.

"If reparations are paid, I feel sure they will not be paid to the Iranians, but to the families," he said.

"I don't see a big impact from this except in terms of an ongoing re-evaluation of the situation there," he said.

Forsythe said the incident will obviously increase anti-American feelings among the Iranians.
