

U.S. men lose Olympic basketball semifinals

Onships both meant silver medals to Yugoslavia's golds. The Pan Am Games were a showcase for Oscar Schmidt, the shooter from Brazil who flew back with a gold medal while the United States again accepted silver.

But the loss to the Soviet Union came in the Olympics. The only blemish on the U.S. basketball record in the Games had been a loss to the Soviets in 1972 that was so tainted the silver medals were never accepted — they remain in a bank vault in Munich.

There was nothing tainted about this Soviet victory. The United States was beaten by a team that was never bothered by the U.S.'s most potent weapon — pressure defense — and a team which showed there is no substitute for international experience and competition.

The U.S. team should "get out of the country and play under international rules and with international referees. That talent isn't enough. You've got to play," Hurley said.

Before the Olympics began, U.S. coach John Thompson was telling people that the system used to select the team was out of date, especially considering that the better international teams were using American training methods and expertise.

"Every year, my team has nice competition with U.S. college basketball teams," Soviet coach Alexander Gomelski said. "We played one year ago against Milwaukee Bucks and recently against Atlanta Hawks."

"United States basketball, NBA basketball help my country. I'm happy. Thank you, United States basketball."

The United States did make a run at the Soviets on Wednesday and got within two points midway through the second half after trailing by 14 just after halftime. But the Soviets held off all challenges and the United States was faced with the possibility of no medal, let alone no gold.

The future could be brighter, however. This tournament was probably the last played under rules where NBA players are banned. FIBA, the sport's international governing body, meets next month and the motion to allow NBA players is expected to pass easily.
