Kerrey identifies issues to tackle

tural committee is now a stronger possibility because Sen. Mechem, D-Mont., lost his Senate seat, Kerrey said.

He said he believes his chances of a position on the appropriations committee are "better than even."

Kerrey said he will benefit from the "unselfish commitment of Sen. Exon" when trying to obtain positions on committees.

Referring to the defeat of Initiative 402, Kerrey said Nebraska should continue to take the lead in protecting the state's underground aquifer.

Regarding the media's role in the election, Kerrey said he believes the press basically does report the message presented, whether it is issues or bickering between the candidates.

Communicating complex issues in a condensed, understandable way is the candidate's responsibility, he said.

Computer virus doesn't disrupt university system

By William Lauer
 Staff Reporter

The computer virus that recently threw computing centers from NASA to private consulting firms into a panic had no effect on the University of Nebraska-Lincoln systems, said Dale Finkelson, MIDNET manager for the UNL Computer Resource Center.

Finkelson shut down UNL's MIDNET system, which ties into a network of 11 Midwestern universities, for about two hours Friday, he said. But the virus did not infect the system, he said.

He took the precaution because MIDNET ties into other national networks that were infected with the virus, Finkelson said. Only people that might have been trying to connect with one of those networks would have been affected by the shutdown, he said.

Finkelson said the virus attacked only Berkeley Unix systems. UNL doesn't have any Berkeley systems, he said.

"There was just nothing here that was vulnerable to it," Finkelson said.

The virus was not considered a particularly harmful strain, he said. His main concern was the time it would take to repair any damage if UNL was infected, he said.
