

Tubes give nostalgic concert

By Michael Deeds
Senior Reporter

The Tubes have been around for ages. But apparently good ol' Fee Waybill and the boys are not tired of touring. It is easy to picture boredom after all these years, but based on their performance at Omaha's Ranch Bowl Wednesday night, they are not done terrorizing audiences yet.

Vocalist/guitarist Waybill was the focal point of the show with his wit and charm. Also, the fact that he sat in a chair onstage through the entire show helped to contrast him with the other band members.

Why did Waybill sit in a chair? Well, he said he will never parachute again, if that is any clue. And judging from his stooped-over hobble getting to and from the dressing room, he probably shouldn't.

But this is all insignificant. The important point is that the Tubes put on one of the more energetic shows that the Ranch Bowl has seen in a long time.

concert REVIEW

The audience consisted of mostly college-aged, regular bar-going types, not over-aged punks wanting to see a part of their culture history, which could be expected.

So, the Tubes may have had a tough night ahead of them, had they not rocked as hard as they possibly could have.

After two or three songs, the audience was mildly enthused. But after the veterans of punk/pop cranked out a version of their catchy smash "She's A Beauty," things got wild.

The music was loud and the band was jamming the rest of the night in a sweaty frolic of Tubes tunes.

"White Punks On Dope" and "Talk To You Later" were two of the most popular songs of the evening, as the audience grew more and more enthusiastic with the band.

Waybill, who continually drank Corona beer (maybe to ease the pain of his back injury?) and played his stylish leads through the onslaught of distortion, seemed coolly pleased with the band's performance, making comments about the audience and band alike.

If you missed them this time, feel bad. It was a lesson in '70s nostalgia, as well as an intimate encounter with a sincere band.
