

Both Japanese musicians steal the show solo sections. An extended drum solo seemed like it would never end, but these problems were sporadic.

Bocle displayed some interesting bass work right before the intermission -- it slowed the pace down considerably, but was still worth it. Generally the group blended the four instruments nicely.

All four are talented individuals, but the two Japanese were the real stars of the show.

After the intermission, Ozone played a solo piece that almost sounded improvised. A mix of styles and difficult changes in time signatures made for some rough moments, but Ozone displayed a lot of talent.

The piece, written by Ozone, had some amazing serges between classical, Latin beat and jazz sounds -- sometimes it didn't work, but when it did, it was incredible.

Perhaps one of the most beautiful works in the program was "Fisherman's Song," written by Okoshi.

"Imagine it's four or five in the morning, and the little fishing boats are coming in," Okoshi said about the piece.

Truly, it was a very pretty, calm, easy sort of ballad -- music to fall in love with.

Another very good moment in the show was a duct between trumpet and piano. The two musicians worked very well together, and at the end, Ozone plucked the piano strings; a nice ending to an elegant ballad.

The quartet sounded a little more experimental than the sounds drifting out of the typical jazz bar at midnight, but it was just as vital and exciting.

Ozone is obviously gifted; in a few years, he may be one of the best jazz musicians in America and the world.
