

'Pet Sematary' is worse than getting a measles shot

Creeds' children comes back from the dead possessed, Rachel's sister comes back from the dead possessed; this whole movie is possessed. I scheduled our exorcism for next week.

WR: I don't want to hear about your Catholic guilt, Lisa. What I want to complain about is Stephen King's cameo appearance as a minister. As you said so nicely, who does he think he is, Alfred Hitchcock? Okay, maybe his profile's better looking, but come on. Self-indulgence really makes me ill.

LD: What the hell do you think this column is? Anyway, King is no Hitchcock. Not even close. Hitchcock inspires creativity; he makes you want to say "shoot, I wish I would have thought of that." But "Pet Sematary" makes me say, "shoot, I wish I hadn't paid to see this."

WR: "Pet Sematary" has the obligatory number of chills and spills designed to make the people behind you scream. It's got plenty of gore. I mean, repeated close-ups of someone's crushed head after being hit by a truck really helped me swallow my buttered popcorn.

LD: Geez, how could I forget the ghost of Christmas future. He's so hysterical. The ghost was Rachel and Louis' conscience, but only Louis could see it. The ghost warns about the evils of the cemetery as well as how to take care of your possessed love ones.

WR: People who love Stephen King are going to love "Pet Sematary." Normally, King novels seem extremely stupid on screen, but this manages to follow the book and entertain us, if the people behind us were any guide. It's gross, it's creepy, and I'll admit it -- it scared me. And the last thing that really scared me was when I ate too many Sugar Babies and thought I wouldn't have a bowel movement ever again.

LD: Now that's gross. I remember once when . . . never mind. This movie review is like the movie, sorry William, it's going nowhere fast.

WR: Picky, picky. You can't have everything, Lisa. Okay, so it wasn't good. But what do you want?

LD: Shut up! Everyone -- don't see the movie, go and get a measles shot -- it's less painful than "Pet Sematary."
