

More women are smoking

nies' harder push is the prominent display of cigarettes as props in movies, he said.

For example, he said, cigarettes appear "up front" as props in some movies that feature actress Whoopi Goldberg.

They also have tried to use the warnings required by the U.S. Surgeon General in their favor, he said.

Stepanek said tobacco companies have their choice of several warnings to use, but they use the warning that cites the dangers to pregnant women and unborn children most often.

Pregnant women represent the smallest demographic group of smokers, he said, and are less likely to smoke regardless of the warnings. Men also pay less attention to warnings aimed at women, he said.

Crofton said warnings about tobacco use have little effect on smokers.

If three-pack-a-day smokers paid any attention to the warnings on cigarette packages, he said, they should have the warnings memorized because they see them so often.

"I should have every one memorized, but I couldn't tell you one," said Crofton, who once smoked three packs a day but has since cut down.

Joseph Anderson, a clinical technician at the health center, said there is a limit to what warnings can do.

Anderson also is the director of a stop-smoking clinic held twice yearly at the health center.

The motivation to stop smoking comes from the smoker's doctor, he said, or from friends who find smoking socially unacceptable.

Crofton said he doesn't think tobacco ads are influential in convincing people to start smoking.

"It's handed down from older brothers and sisters and parents," he said.

Lutes said ads affect the smoker's decision of what brand to smoke, but that's all.

"When you first start smoking, you don't know what brand you like," he said.

Newman said tobacco ads are influential.

Tobacco companies wouldn't spend $7 to $8 per person in Nebraska if advertising wasn't effective, he said.

The two smokers in the main lounge said the stress of college life causes some students to start smoking.

"I know 10 or 12 people who end up smoking during finals," Crofton said.

Lutes said he is considerate of non-smokers who don't like smoke, but can't believe the "incredible clampdown" on smoking at UNL.

UNL won't get aquaculturalist

Those who engage in aquaculture can lose large amounts of money because of the risk involved.

"You can't make a mistake in aquaculture," he said. "You have to be very, very careful."

Bernard-Stevens said aquaculture has the potential to be a more productive industry in the state. But, he said, farmers need an aquacultural specialist who can advise them in some of the specialties.

Sen. Don Wesely of Lincoln said he thinks $50,000 is a reasonable amount of money to invest for agricultural diversification in the state.

"It's a small amount of money that can turn itself over many times," Wesely said.

Wesely said he thinks senators should fund the proposal because a bill that was passed two years ago by the Legislature mandates a position for an aquaculture specialist.

Sen. Jerome Warner of Waverly, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said it was not a committee "oversight" that members didn't recommend funding for aquaculture.

Warner said the NU Board of Regents did not request funding for aquaculture.

tent-covered plaza on the block north of the Centrum and south of the Cooper Theatre. Parks said this would help create the "open space" that is needed in downtown Lincoln.

Also presented were ideas for linking downtown to the Haymarket District. This could be done by constructing elevated walkways over streets with heavy traffic, which would encourage pedestrians to visit both areas, Parks said.

Mike Dekalb, a city planner for the Lincoln Planning Department, said he saw some encouraging ideas in the presentation, and recommended it be presented again before more city officials.

"There are a lot of good ideas which should be passed on," he said. "They definitely should not be lost."

Tom Laging, professor of architecture, said it is not unusual for ideas presented in his class to be implemented in city development.

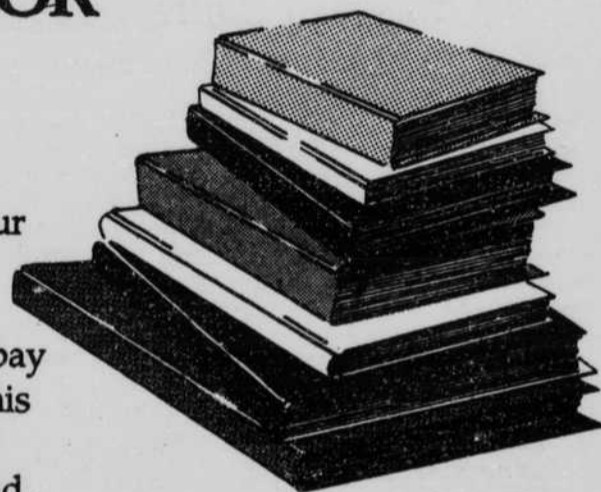

Past projects have focused on the Haymarket District, areas of Omaha and the state capitol environs, he said. The latter project, involving the state capitol, was completed in 1974 with extensive student input, Laging said.

"Students often are freer to think about the things since they aren't as caught up in reality," he said. "They aren't caught up in the land and economic realities, and the politics of what's doable."
