lished in the United States. Traditionally, Vietnamese women were expected to serve the men in their family, in the event of their husbands' deaths they would have to serve their sons. Some of the many expectations of the women included cooking and sewing as well as other household duties. As the film progresses to show the new Western Vietnamese society, the role of women changes. They still do household work but also enter the work force. One woman interviewed was a hydroelectric engineer in a place where only two women were employed, showing how well the Vietnamese adapted to the West. Two other films of Trinh T. Minh-ha will be shown this weekend. "Reassemblage," about the role of women in Senegal, will be shown Thursday at 7 p.m. and Sunday at 2:15 p.m. "Naked Spaces: Living is Round," also profiles West African culture and will be shown following "Reassemblage" Thursday and Friday at 7:30 p.m. "Surname Viet Given Name Nam" will follow "Reassemblage" Sunday at 2:15 and 7:30 p.m. Trinh T. Minh-ha will be present for discussions about her films.

Film highlights African people, universe

By Gretchen Boehr Senior Reporter

An unusual film capturing the texture, color and sound of West Africa will play at Sheldon Memorial Art Gallery Thursday and Friday.

"Naked Spaces: Living is Round" is more than a documentary of African people. It illustrates how universal elements such as earth, sky and light are interrelated with the African people and elements of music and shelter.

The filmmaker makes the point that African people and the universe create a circle of life.

The use of voice-overs and scenes where the natural sound suddenly stops makes this film unusual. It isn't a typical tourist documentary of tribal rituals and children with swollen stomachs.

In this documentary, abstract ideas are left out for the viewer to string into a poem.

The photography is taken at unusual angles -- through doorways and other crevices. The camera often rests on a bare foot or a face for a moment and then a clay pot or adobe house surrounded by trees, grass and other Africans.

movie REVIEW

In one scene a women's voice says that life is round and the circle is the perfect form.

"Everything round invites touch or caress."

"Naked Spaces" also explores the different styles of African homes and their relation to people and the universe.

"Houses and humans are both made of small balls of earth."

Those who enjoy films with lots of scenery and an abstract study of human nature won't want to miss "Naked Spaces."

The film runs 135 minutes and, though it is interesting, the beautiful photography and lack of dialogue can have a somewhat cata-tonic effect on the viewer.

As well as a filmmaker, Trinh T. Minh-ha is a writer and composer who lectures on feminism, art and film. She presently is teaching cinema at San Francisco State University.

She taught music at the National Conservatory of Music in Dakar, Senegal for three years.

Her time in Africa inspired her to shoot two films in West Africa -- "Reassemblage" in 1982 and "Naked Spaces" in 1985.

"Naked Spaces" received the Blue Ribbon Award for Best Experimental Feature at the American International Film Festival and the Golden Athena Award for Best Feature Documentary at the Athens International Film Festival in 1986.

"Reassemblage" shreds the tourist stereotypes of African people. Trinh focuses on and ridicules social scientists of culture.

"Reassemblage" was exhibited at The New York Film Festival in 1983 and has toured the United States with the Asian American Film Festival.

Trinh has just completed another feature-length film, "Surname Viet Given Name Nam," on Vietnamese women and the history of women resistance in Vietnam.

"Naked Spaces" will play Thursday at 7 p.m. with "Reassemblage," and Friday at 7:30 p.m.

Along with the Thursday evening showing, "Reassemblage" will play Sunday at 2:15 p.m. with "Surname Viet Given Name Nam." "Surname Viet Given Name Nam" also will play at 7:30 p.m. Sunday. Trinh will attend the screenings to discuss her work with the audiences.
