likely Masterson will win an Academy Award for the film, her performance as the level-headed Lucy Moore is gripping and realistic. (She also has a quite pleasant singing voice, evidenced in her duet with Glenn Close, on Van Morrison's "Into the Mystic.")

Close, of "Fatal Attraction" and "Dangerous Liaisons," strikes an emotional chord with her portrayal of Linda Spector. The vulnerable, gentle way Close handles Linda is admirable. Already nominated for five Academy Awards in the past, Close acquits herself well with this film.

Woods is a veritable bastion of sympathy and strength. He is the cheerleader character, dealing with his problems by making them into jokes. He seems to have perfected his "It'll be all right, dear" in this film. His Rock of Gibraltar exterior breaks noticeably during one scene in the film, but in the next scene he's back to being his wife's support system. When he's able to let his guard down, it's rather touching. Michael is the type of guy most of us would want by our side in a crisis.

Dillon's character is oversimplified. He does, however, bring a sweetness and a naivete to his character that is touching. Sam has a hard time showing his feelings, and is crazy about his girlfriend. He only wants to have a career in music and to stay devoted to Lucy for the rest of his life. His talk of making "contacts" and meeting roadies is almost pathetic. Sam is an abrupt departure from earlier Dillon characters -- most notably the violent Bunny of "Platoon" -- but works because of Dillon's obvious dedication to the role. Music is unobtrusive in this film, thankfully, but Otis Redding's "Motherless Children," Van Morrison's "Into the Mystic" and Beethoven's "Trio in E Flat Major, Opus 3" add subtle shading to the overall effect.

disgusted with layers of sauce and condiments that the burger is somewhat enjoyable.

The receipt system. The theory behind this fast food is that it takes a short amount of time to receive meals after ordering. Burger King does a pretty good job of getting people in and out with their state-of-the-art system of ordering and receiving.

First the food is ordered and paid for and then the customer receives a ticket and waits at another counter until his or her number is read.

But the number on the receipt is printed in dot matrix and is incredibly hard to read. Maybe this is why the person at the counter tells each customer what the number is. But for those students who are in a daze, hung over or not listening, it can be difficult to distinguish certain numbers.

And when Burger King is busy, it's a waste of time to just order a drink because you still have to go through the process of receiving the receipt and waiting for them to call your number.

After adding up the pros and cons Burger King is convenient and more than tolerable.

The blue neon restaurant has established itself as the heart of the campus and has become a vital part of UNL student life.
