cannot take the English class without the food science course.
The food science course and the English course are worth three credit hours each, he said.
The food science course is recommended for underclassmen who are not majoring in chemistry, food science or human nutrition, he said.
Carr said the food science course will teach students about the chemical and molecular nature of food, food fads, functions of the human body, preservation of food and how cattle feed affects the beef humans eat.

Carr said that he and two other professors from the departments of Food Science and Nutrition will trade off teaching the semester-long science course.
Carr, who also is chairman of the UNL science subcommittee for the Committee for the Advancement of General Education, said he and the members of the subcommittee are in the process of having the food science course approved as a science elective credit in all UNL colleges.

The research will be done by Gililand and a University of Nebraska at Omaha professor, along with graduate students who will be chosen later this year.
Elwin Larson, city engineer for the Omaha public works department, said the university's project will "help us lay out an agenda to attract businesses to this area."

Recycling is concentrated primarily on the East and West coasts. Locating businesses in the Midwest to recycle would save shipping costs, he said.
The project is a cooperative effort of the university, Douglas County, the city of Omaha, Omaha Public Power District, the Papio-Missouri Natural Resources District and the Omaha World-Herald.
