

Meat

for the Meat Puppets to get picked up by a major label soon. Kirkwood's vocals are not particularly distinctive, but they are smooth and sort of average-guy sounding.

Brother Cris Kirkwood is more intense, though less multi-faceted. He peeks out from behind his hair when he tosses his head up for some background harmony. His bass playing is fast and vicious, even in ethereal songs when Kurt softly picks his guitar.

Behind the brothers sits drummer Derrick Bostrom, who drums steadily, sometimes harder, sometimes softer. Bostrom is the background guy, the quiet one. He sported a new haircut for the crowd Saturday.

The Puppets rely more on music than voice, though the Kirkwoods' harmonies are great, even Grateful Deadish.

But the magic of the Meat Puppets comes from their informality and love of music. There was no opening act. It was cold outside. There really weren't too many people in the club.

Yet the Meat Puppets took the stage in leaps and bounds, simply tearing into their tunes, many from their new release on SST, "Monsters."

The Meat Puppets have evolved tremendously since their beginnings, from the cathartic chaos of "Meat Puppets" in 1982, to the prairie-punk mosh of "Meat Puppets II" and finally into a fusion of the two, which evolved over a few more albums. "Monsters" combines elements of the old and the new. And behind it, the album leaves a chameleon-like collection of Meat Puppet creativity.

The instrumental power of "Attacked By Monsters" raised the highest level of appreciation from the darkly-clad crowd, as Kirkwood screamed to the point of physical danger.

He pummeled his instrument, and the typical reverberated, hollow distortion that typifies the Puppets seemed to garner a few extra volts.

But the 1 1/2 hour set, though powerful, sometimes became a trifle monotonous when the Meat Puppets played speed metal bluegrass time and time again.

But this style is what they have found most attractive during their dabbings all these years. This is what hard-core Meat freaks want. Meat freaks are the people that chant "More meat, more meat," when they want an encore, though the Puppets gladly encored Saturday.

And, all in all, the Puppets' thrashy bluegrass is quite unique. Kirkwood's finger dexterity is simply incredible to watch.

Dueling banjos, step aside for the flaming Kirkwoods. They are an experience.
