this on a whim."

"We may well never have a case under this code, but it's something we need to consider," he said.

Making the policy part of the student code of conduct would enable students to file charges with Student Judicial Affairs.

David Moshman, professor of educational psychology, agreed that the university should take a stand on fighting words. Hill said he has consulted with Moshman about formulating a policy.

The policy should include abusive sexist and anti-gay references as well as racist ones, Moshman said.

"There needs to be a clear understanding that people are clearly able to express their ideas," he said.

Yolanda Scott, interim president of D.R.E.A.M. (Developing Realistic Educational Activities for Minorities), said most minority leaders on campus support the proposal.

"I think that people will become more cautious of words that would be perceived as fighting words," Scott said. "People will be thinking before they speak."

Although the policy would not end racial problems on campus, it would help the university "deal with racial discrimination" and would be a deterrent to abusive speech, Scott said.

Griesen said he will try to finish formulating a policy for UNL students and faculty to consider in the next few weeks.

A change in the student code of conduct must be recommended by the chancellor and approved by the NU Board of Regents after input from students and faculty members, Griesen said.

not know what that system will be. Personal computers are one option that could be used for beginning computer science classes, he said.

The center purchased 38 additional Apple Macintosh computers this year. Kutish said they will be ready for use in fall, when money for software, furniture and a security system is available.

The computers will be added to existing computer labs, Kutish said.
