in an expensive-looking robe. He then took the microphone from the ring announcer and said, "Cut the music. For all you lazy, out-of-shape, Lincoln losers, keep the noise down while I take off my robe, so the ladies can look at what they wished they could have."

From the crowd's response, not too many of the ladies were impressed with what they saw. Then abruptly from the dressing room, "Hacksaw" came, along with his trademark two by four raised high in the air.

The match was a typical grudge match. It went back and forth with each wrestler exchanging damaging blows. And whenever Rude would hurt "Hacksaw," he wouldn't take advantage of the situation, but would stop and pose for the women. Again and again and again.

The match wore on and on, until "Hacksaw" was able to use one of Rude's mistakes to his advantage and pinned him.

The next match was a tag team bout that definitely was the most boring of all. It pitted half the Orient Express and Mr. Fugi vs. Mark Young and Pez Whatley. Evidently, the other half of the Orient Express was sick or something, because Mr. Fugi is their manager and is getting much too old and out of shape to wrestle anymore. Their opponents, Young and Whatley, the good guys, came into the ring with a burst of energy and displayed it by break dancing.

The match went on for too long, until finally, Young pinned the Orient Express and put an end to this anemic showing.

After the match was over, the ring announcer again, for the third time, plugged the WWF wrestling magazine and the WWF sales counters out in the lobby.

The next match featured two distinctively different tag teams, The Rockers vs. Powers of Pain. Powers of Pain, the bad guys, are, to say the very least, quite a sight to see. They are two overly-muscular men clad in black leather, fur, claws and chains to go along with their mohawks and huge goatees. The Rockers, the good guys, ran into the ring with about as much energy and enthusiasm as they would have running to the record store to buy the new Poison tape. These guys have long hair, pretty faces and wear brightly-colored bandannas.

The tag team match was typical of any other Rockers match. Once again, they did everything in a fast fury of togetherness. Double drop-kicks, double clotheslines, double everything. Luckily, total pandemonium broke out, and the Powers of Pain were disqualified for using a chair on one of the Rockers.

Probably the most revealing match of the whole evening was the last. It pitted "The American Dream" Dusty Rhodes vs. "Macho King" Randy Savage. "Macho King," the bad guy, was led to the ring by his manager, "Sensational Queen" Sherri. The "Macho King's" attire was royally extravagant, but Sherri was the center of attention in her black skirt, complete with stockings and garters. "The American Dream," the good guy, was led to the ring by his manager, Sapphire. He and Sapphire were wearing their usual black-with-yellow-polka-dot outfits.

After all the hoopla had died down, the match finally got started. It went much as expected. Back and forth, back and forth, each wrestler exchanging blow for blow. But the real fun was watching Sherri and Sapphire yell at each other and eventually all four of them go nuts. And while Sherri was getting beat up by Sapphire, her skirt slowly inched its way up further and further, until she was mooning the entire crowd. But that didn't stop her for a second.

Needless to say, "Macho King" was disqualified for attempting to use a chair against "The American Dream."

After an exciting night of WWF wrestling at its best, it is sad to say that the highlight of the night was Sherri in her underwear making a mockery of herself.

Hulk Hogan would be ashamed.

Influence

Claire's body into the La Brea Tar Pits.

By the end of the movie, Michael really is regretting picking this guy up on the beach.

This is a movie that has little or no redeeming social value whatsoever. The audience witnesses the downfall of a sweet, slightly overstressed young man, and the triumph of the crazed nut that leads him to the total destruction of his life. Neat.

At least the movie points out the dangers of taking strangers home.

The plot is not very convincing. One might question why Alex hates Michael, and why Michael picks this guy up in the first place. Or, for that matter, why any of this is happening. The only redeeming value of the film is to finally see Alex get what he deserves.

The actors, at least, do a good job with their roles. James Spader is convincing as the well-meaning Michael. His descent into near-madness and back up again is fascinating to watch.

Rob Lowe is totally over the edge as the really bizarre Alex. Toward the end of this film, one begins to wonder if the character's obsession for videotaping everything is in some way indicative of Lowe's infamous videotaped sex-scandal.

"Bad Influence" is playing at the Douglas 3 Theatres, 13th and P streets.

Caterwaul

At first glance, Caterwaul seems twisted, but on second look they may not be twisted enough. The inherent lack of melody and incomprehensible singing of Martin makes one assume Caterwaul doesn't have much worth saying.

Chalk another one up in the loss column for a rock band with a female lead singer.
