Reservists get ready to move out

By Lee Rood

About 20 UNL student reservists have been affected by U.S. military involvement in the Middle East and that number is expected to grow, an administrative assistant to the vice chancellor for student affairs said Tuesday.

Linda Schwartzkopf said her primary responsibility lately has been helping student reservists adjust their class schedules when duty calls. Thus far, Schwartzkopf said, four recently activated reservists have met with her to adjust schedules.

In addition, Schwartzkopf said, she has been in contact with at least 20 students who have been called to duty or will be soon.

About seven of those students, she said, are members of an Omaha-based medical unit that will begin its annual training in November. The unit, which includes Lincoln and Grand Island detachments, typically does its annual training during the summer but will go early because of the crisis.

One of the student members of the unit, Laurie Stiegert, said her unit will leave Nov. 3 for Pennsylvania and should only be gone for two weeks -- unless they are activated.

Whether or not the unit will be activated, said Stiegert's detachment commander, Sgt. Rick Witte, is "the $6 million question."

If the group is activated, about 30 students in the 130-member Lincoln detachment will be affected.

In the meantime, Witte said, the stepped-up annual training is a precautionary measure taken by the military to make sure the unit gets the training it needs on certain equipment.

Students forced to leave the university because of a commitment to the reserves are being dealt with on an individual basis, Schwartzkopf said.

Most of those students can choose to withdraw from their classes or take incompletes, she said.

"Most professors are being very accommodating," she said.

If the students opt to withdraw from a course, Schwartzkopf said, "we are working with them to allow a full refund on tuition if they have

ASUN election debates limited to 6

By Jennifer O'Clilka

The Electoral Commission Tuesday passed a provision allowing a maximum of six debates, all conducted by the commission, during student government elections.

The new provision also states that the Electoral Commission will allow for participation in the debates by all executive candidates and will publish the details of the debate format and procedures 10 days before the beginning of the campaign period.

No other debates among executive candidates for Association of Students of the University of Nebraska will be authorized during the campaign, the new section states.

Bart Vitek, director of the Electoral Commission, said the commission would sponsor the debates and get student groups to ask the questions.

Previous rules allowed any organization to sponsor an ASUN election debate if it registered with the commission one week before the event. Eight registered debates -- two per week -- were allowed during the four-week election period.

Ned Hedges, a faculty representative to the commission, said the biggest change was limiting debates to those sponsored by the commission.

The original proposal before the commission would have limited the number of debates to four.

Jeremy Felker, a political science major, said cutting the number of debates in half would not help get more students involved.

By making all debates Electoral Commission-sponsored, "you're taking care of quality," Felker said. "If you go to every different

Park planned for Temple block

Businesses look for new spots to set up shop

Businesses neighboring the Temple Building are looking for a new spot to set up shop because of plans to change their block into a park.

The Hole Works, 1227 R St., Kinko's, 1229 R St., Taco Inn, 1245 R St., and daVinci's, 13th and Q streets, will be torn down as part of the plan to build a park on the University of Nebraska-Lincoln City Campus linking it to downtown Lincoln.

The Temple Building, located at 12th and R streets, is the only building that will be left standing on the block.

The park is part of a long-range plan developed in 1985-86 to provide green space around the Lied Center for Performing Arts.

Kim Todd, a UNL campus landscape architect, said the park will cost about $250,000. The NU Foundation is working on financing for the project, she said.

A starting date for the construction has not been set, Todd said. "I can say that it won't be before next summer," she said.

Jack Goebel, associate chancellor and vice chancellor for business and finance, said businesses on the block, owned by the NU Foundation or the university, have varying arrangements as to when their leases expire.

Sharon Kuhn, manager and owner of The Hole Works, is looking for a new location for the shop because its lease expires in July 1991.

Regulars to the restaurant are disappointed about the relocation, she said.

Kinko's already has secured a new location in the old Baskin-Robbins store at 12th and Q streets. The business will move Dec. 1, 1990.

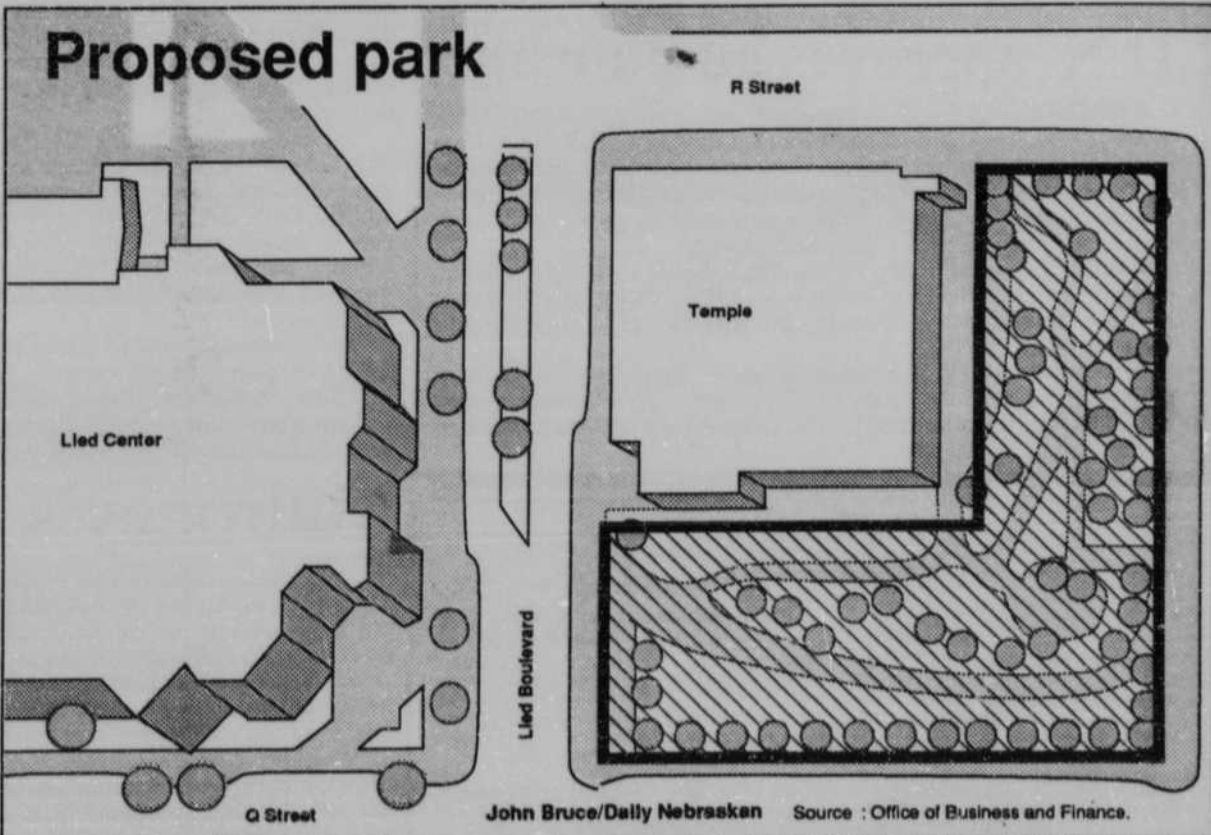

Rod Geist, shift supervisor, said he felt the move would not affect business.

"The new store is larger so it will improve the service we can offer," he said, and "will also be to the workers' benefit."

Kent Knudson, vice president of daVinci's, said the restaurant will remain at its current location until January 1993.

"It is critical to our business that we don't portray ourselves as moving soon," he said.
