During the second phase of the program, artists visit the classrooms of the teachers who attended the summer workshop. The artists help the teachers and their students develop creativity and problem-solving skills.

Part three of the program is having the children and teachers attend a Lied Center performance once each semester, Voorhees said.

Teachers and artists talk about the performance and the discipline before and after the performance. In this way, the performance is not the final exposure the school children have to a particular discipline, she said.

The teachers are prepared to discuss the performances before seeing them because part of the summer workshop focuses on Lied Center events during the upcoming season, Voorhees said.

"They (the teachers) get to see part of what's to be presented during the season," she said. "People from the performing companies come and talk with, or perform for, the people in the workshop."

The program's popularity and success is evident in the fact that another program is being established in western Nebraska, she said.

In November, she is going to Scottsbluff to start the "Arts are Basic-West" program for summer 1991, Voorhees said. The program will be in cooperation with the UNL continuing studies program, Northwest Nebraska Community College, the public school system and the Lied Center. A workshop will be held in Scottsbluff next year, in addition to a workshop in Lincoln.

She is also working on a partnership with some of Nebraska's private and parochial schools to establish a program in those schools, she said.

"We're building kids, reaching children who will be the next generation's audience," Voorhees said. "But it (the program) also teaches the thinking skills and creativity needed in the schools.

"What we offer the children is the ability to perceive a problem, consider solutions and make the choice of an intelligent solution," she said.

"This is the people's palace," Voorhees said, "and it's the education that gives Nebraskans ownership of the Lied Center."

UNL professors' opera, compositions to be performed at faculty concert

From Staff Reports

The University of Nebraska-Lincoln School of Music will present The Faculty Composers Concert on Oct. 11 at Kimball Recital Hall, featuring Professors Randall Snyder and Robert Beadell.

Snyder, a professor of music composition, will premiere two new works. The first, entitled "Three Polemics," will be played by Brent Beech on the clarinet and Professor William Carpenter on piano. The second will be "Two Armies," featuring the poetry of Stephen Spender, sung by Stephen Bobst and played on piano by Emmy Bobst.

The Bobsts also combine talents with Snyder's 1989 work, "Polar Exploration." Also, "October Light" will be performed by Professor William McMullen on oboe and Catherine Herbener on piano.

Two scenes for Robert Beadell's opera, "The Number of Fools," will be sung by Professor Donna Harler and Dan Kurek, played by Michael Cotton on piano, and staged by David Bartholomew.

"We've gone down different roads," said Boehmer, "but when the idea came up to do this, everyone made it back in town. We're all looking forward to it."

The Heart Murmurs will have the stage through Friday. Saturday night, the James Harman Band takes over. The Murmurs show starts at 9 p.m. Tickets are $4 at the door.
