

Interest revives in Mediterranean tours

By Michael Hannon
Staff Reporter

An archeological tour of Greece and Crete sponsored by the University of Nebraska-Lincoln is back on track now that the war in the Persian Gulf is over, according to the tour's director.

Michael Hoff, an assistant professor of art and art history, said the tour never officially was cancelled, but it was threatened because the war caused a severe lack of interest.

Christa Joy, program coordinator for International Educational Services, said there were no inquiries about the trip for the duration of the gulf war.

But since the end of the war, Joy said, about a dozen people have asked about it. No one has put down a deposit on the tour yet, she said.

Hoff, who lives in Greece during the summer, said the war did not mean travel in Greece was unsafe.

"Fear of terrorism shouldn't keep people away from Greece," Hoff said.

Although there have been terrorist activities in Greece during recent months, he said, the incidents were not related to the war.

Hoff said the only terrorist group currently operating in Greece is called November 17 and is attempting to rid Greece of Western influence. The group has not attacked foreign individuals and has caused no fatalities in recent years, he said.

The three-week tour, from May 18 to June 8, is mainly for students, but interested members of the public may participate. Students can receive class credit at the 300 or graduate level.

The cost is expected to be between $2,800 and $2,900, which includes air fare from Omaha, motels, some meals, entry to archeological sites, transportation while in Greece and insurance, Hoff said.

Official debates Niobrara issue with landowner

By Matt Seaman

A National Audubon Society official and a landowner squared off before about 100 people in a debate Friday at the East Union about whether the government should designate the Niobrara a National Scenic River.

The designation of a National Scenic River along the Niobrara in northern Nebraska is an example of government overstepping its bounds, said Charlie Ward, who owns land close to the Niobrara.

But Ron Klataske, west central regional vice president for the National Audubon Society, argued that the government must protect its resources.

Legislation was proposed by members of Nebraska's congressional delegation to make the Niobrara a National Scenic River. If their proposal passes, land on each side of the 77-mile stretch of the river would be owned by the government.

Opponents to the proposal have inflated the toll it would take on landowners, Klataske said.

A lot of the figures brought up in debates over the issue were speculation, he said, as no one can tell how much agriculture production would be decreased.

"I think we can only make a judgement about how much land will be taken out of agriculture," he said.

Ward argued that the government should not be involved with the Niobrara.

"The best government is the least government," he said.

The men also argued about each other's qualifications for judging the Niobrara issue.

Klataske attacked Ward for speaking on the issue when he doesn't own land in the area that would be directly affected.

"I will gladly buy you a $12 steak in Valentine this summer if you can show me that you own land a quarter of a mile from the river," Klataske said, challenging Ward.

Ward attacked Klataske for being a "hired gun" brought in to deal with the issue. Klataske hasn't been involved in the community, he said, so he should not be making judgments about its resources.

Ward called for anyone with a stake in the issue to get involved as he did.

"I got on the telephone and I started asking who was involved," he said. He stressed that others could do the same thing.

Now is the time to "call your markers in" if any politicians owe a favor, Ward said, to influence how the issue is decided.
