an additional affiliation, he said. The group is involved in campuswide recycling, developing an Environmental Resource Center and preparing for a four-state conference to be hosted at UNL on Sept. 27-29, he said.

Aram Montgomery, junior economics major and regional coordinator for Ecology Now, said the organization lobbied at last year's SEAC national conference to host the regional conference.

"The conference will be the biggest thing that's ever happened ecologically in the state," he said.

Iowa, Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska will be represented, he said, and both national and local speakers along with workshops are on the agenda.

Montgomery said the national energy policy and renewable energy sources will be some of the scheduled topics.

The conference will be open to the public and 500 participants are expected, he said.

The Environmental Resource Center opening in mid-September is a joint effort of Ecology Now, UNL Wildlife Club, UNL Biology Club, Natural Resources Law Society and TriBeta Honorary, Regan added.

The center will serve as an ecology library and education campaign center, Regan explained. Environmental books, videos and other environmental media will be accessible to anyone.

Another campus goal should bring full-scale recycling to all residence halls by the fall semester, said Jeff Riggert, junior biology major and recycling coordinator for Ecology Now.

Currently, aluminum and glass receptors are used in Selleck Residence Hall only, he added.

"When recycling is made convenient for students, with receptors on every floor, they participate," Riggert said.

Regan said currently Ecology Now members have been making presentations to area high schools in hopes of attracting new students for next fall, in addition to educating the younger students.

"The younger kids start, the better they follow through," Regan said.
