Official: Cause of fewer gifts not recession

By Steve Pearson
Staff Reporter

The University of Nebraska Foundation, bucking the national trend, is not blaming lower gift levels on the recession, an official said.

Speaking after the end of the 1990-91 fiscal year June 30, public relations Director Theresa Klein said the foundation is not attributing curbed gift levels to the recession.

An article in The Chronicle of Higher Education reported that some university foundations lowered their money intake due to the recession.

Private contributions to U.S. colleges and universities rose 10 percent in 1989-90, and the NU Foundation reported a record gift income of more than $28 million. Income for the 1990-91 year will not be released until August.

Klein said the foundation does not expect 1990-91 gifts to match the previous year, but that officials do not believe the recession is the cause.

"We do anticipate that gifts will be down slightly from last year, but we had a $6 million gift from the Lied Foundation. There are a lot of ups and downs in fund raising," Klein said.

"It is hard to attribute fluctuations in gifts to any particular outside event like a recession," she said.

Foundation officials are "not aware of a single incident where a donor has asked to delay a gift" due to the recession, she said.

But factors such as the recession may figure in individuals' decisions about making charitable contributions, Klein said.

The full impact of the recession, she said, may not be felt in the 1990-91 fiscal year.

"On a national average, your major gift is an 18-month process. The effects of an outside factor such as a recession may not be felt for awhile."
