Academic Senate presses for faculty input into cuts

By Tom Kunz

Anger. That is the message the Academic Senate hopes to send to the University of Nebraska-Lincoln administration about its proposed budget cuts.

The senate passed a resolution Tuesday urging the Budget Reduction Review Committee and Academic Planning Committee to assure proper faculty input in the budget-reduction process.

The process is in response to a Nebraska Legislature mandate last spring that required UNL to cut 2 percent of its budget this year and 1 percent next year.

George Tuck, president of the Academic Senate, said he hopes the administration gets the message.

"I would hope that the administration would read into the amount of anger in this resolution," he said.

Tuck said the resolution was not as extreme as it could have been.

"If the faculty had followed their emotions instead of their intellect, they would have charged up the steps to the administration building and laid siege to the state," he said.

Peter Bleed, professor of anthropology, said he wanted the senate to take a tougher stand. Bleed called former resolutions "potentially cagey, subtle and terribly nice."

"They looked as though they've been edited by Ward Cleaver," Bleed said.

Tuck said that he understands the anger of the senate members but that more can be accomplished with "a cooperative kind of attitude."

Tuck said that he's never seen the Academic Senate as frustrated as they are now.

"There were a few cannons that were primed," Tuck said. "The administration barely averted lighting the fuses."

If the administration does react unfavorably to the resolution, the Academic Senate will hold an emergency meeting Oct. 22.

Options available to the senate would be limited, Tuck said. The most extreme would be a vote of no confidence in the administration, he said.

"I can't remember an administration being censured," said Tuck, who has taught at UNL for 21 years.

This censure would make the future careers of current administrators gloomy, he said.

"If they are censured, it's almost like the kiss of death," Tuck said. "Would you want to hire someone who had been censured by the faculty?"

success of the project to Congressional support.

"Support has been outstanding throughout this project. (Sen. Robert) Kerrey was a great help and one of the head workers with Congress," he said. "And Virginia Smith was a strong advocate of the project and Bereuter and others have all been strongly supportive."

House approval of the Agriculture Appropriations Conference Report also including funding plans for three other UNL programs: AG*SAT, rural development programs included in the USDA Extension Service and Nebraska special research grants.
