ous. I think I saw five or six cops patrolling the area, and they seemed to have their hands full.

Inside, it was a freak show: greasy moshers with nose rings and bad tattoos, militant street rappers tired of waiting for PE to come to Chicago, and a few ancient-looking Anthrax devotees. Those without tickets were trying everything to try to weasel a way in. For the women wearing leather mini-skirts, there was usually a way to get past security.

Most importantly, though, there was a terrific racial mix in Chicago, one that may have made the police nervous, but provided the black and white interaction that the bands had in mind.

It was ironic that in Champaign the Enemy's Chuck D, music's most critical rapper and the man most had come to see, was booed for criticizing the Illinois mascot—the Illini Indian.

Anthrax and Public Enemy are bringing more than noise on this tour, and they will probably bring it to a few more places where they won't quite be heard.

Jim's Journal

Today Ruth and I ate at a pancake restaurant.

While we were waiting for our food, we read the paper placemats.

On the backs they had games and puzzles for kids to play.

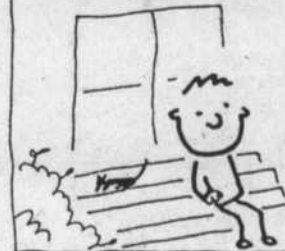

Ruth wanted to play the dot-to-dot but neither of us had a pen.

I let Mr. Peterson outside for a little while today.

Like usual, she was really scared, and stayed pretty much in one place.

But she eventually explored all the stairs near the door.

After she did that, she went back to her space and stayed there.

Jim's Journal

I saw Tony today on the way to my mailbox.

He was with his new girlfriend, Jill.

They both said 'Hi, Jim,' in unison as they passed me.

I got my mail and all I got was a flyer about a missing child.

Jim's Journal

I got a newspaper today and sat at the table to read it.

Mr. Peterson jumped up on the table and stood on the newspaper.

I put her back on the floor.

Then she ran into the other room and meowed over and over.

Jim's Journal

At the copy store today I was working at the cash register.

Hardly any customers were coming in, and we stood there for a long time not saying anything.

Once, Julie came up to me and started searching for something in the shelves under the counter.

She found some paper clips, then went back to her copy machine.
