

ASUN OKs planning committee

Massey excluded, speaker says

ASUN senators passed legislation Wednesday that creates a five-year planning committee with the Government Liaison Committee in an advisory position but gives the president little input.

Speaker of the Senate Steve Thomlison said the planning committee was a good idea but that the senate had made a mistake in not including the ASUN president in the process.

"The makeup, without any input from the student body president, is a very dangerous direction to go," he said.

The planning committee was created to research different areas of the university and, if approved by ASUN President Andy Massey, will submit a report to the senate describing a vision for the area in five years.

The committee will be headed by the second vice president of the Association of Students of the University of Nebraska, and four at-large members will be appointed by the Appointments Board.

Thomlison said the president should appoint the four at-large members. He said that because the second vice president isn't elected on the same ticket as the president, and the two won't always share opinions.

In the case of an adverse relationship between the second vice president and the president, Thomlison said the president would have no input on the committee.

Massey said that he had no reservations about allowing the Appointments Board, headed by the speaker of the senate, to select committee members this year but that he feared for future years.

Thomlison agreed. "You're not always going to have such a great speaker," he said.

In other business, ASUN approved campaigning rules for next spring's senate election.

As of the first Monday after Thanksgiving, advertisements for meetings, personal mailings and appearances before organizations to raise funds and gain support can begin.

Visual campaigning, including, but not limited to, posters, banners, buttons, visuals on clothing, booths and fliers are prohibited until Feb. 12, 1992. Posters cannot be displayed until Feb. 26, 1992.

chairwoman and associate professor of textiles, clothing and design, said that "after reading the statements... thinking time is required to piece all the information together."

Kent Hendrickson, professor and dean of libraries, said he knew the process would be time-consuming but said it has taken even more time than he expected.

As a result, the committee members have had to make cuts in their time budgets. Most of those cuts fall in research areas and in their personal lives.

If teaching didn't remain the top priority, said June Levine, professor of English, it would be equivalent to "the tail wagging the dog."

Lloyd Ambrosius, a professor of history, said that he refused to sacrifice his classroom obligations, but his reading, research and writing have been sacrificed to make time for the BRRC.

"I need to catch up on reading and writing commitments that I hoped to have accomplished by now," Ambrosius said.

Wheeler, Levine and Kean also said their research had been delayed, and Wheeler said he had to find time to finish writing a chapter of a book by December.

Hendrickson said that making

BRRC one of his top priorities meant sacrifices for him also.

"I do most of my regular work on weekends, I'm not always available for library events and I've had to cancel several out-of-town meetings," he said.

Fortunately, Kean said, co-workers and students have been "pretty positive" about her role as a BRRC member.

When the budget cuts are over, these five BRRC members said they hoped to return to their regular schedules.

"It will be wonderful to live a more normal life," Levine said.

What will she do with her free time?

"Maybe my laundry," Levine said.

Levine also plans to continue her professional writing and plan her spring semester courses, which would normally have been planned by now, she said.

Sixteen of the 28 BRRC members also serve on the Academic Planning Committee, which will make the final decision on budget cuts with the recommendations of the BRRC.

APC members were included automatically into BRRC, said Hendrickson, an APC member. Other faculty and staff BRRC members were selected by the Academic Senate and by university administration, he said.

BRRC members hope to be finished with budget cuts by the end of fall semester, Levine said.

sics is eliminated, it will cost more for other departments such as English to teach classics courses. He estimated that the English department would have to add 10 new faculty to teach the classics courses.

If that money cannot be found, he said, then other programs will be affected extensively.

His testimony was the department's final appearance before the BRRC. However, if the committee votes to endorse the recommendation to cut the department, the department will receive another chance to testify before the Academic Planning Committee.

In other business, the BRRC passed a motion by John Peters, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, to vote on all budget recommendations unrelated to the Institute of Agriculture and Natural Resources on Monday. BRRC will vote on the IANR today.
