four commuter students would share desk and closet space. Beds would be removed.

"They could operate out of an office on campus . . . for the time that they're here," Griesen said.

The proposal, initially targeted to UNL freshmen who commute from home, would be a more affordable alternative to living in the residence halls, Griesen said.

The students probably would be required to eat at least five meals a week in the cafeteria, he said. However, Griesen said, the cost probably still would be under $500 a semester because it would be split between four people.

"It would be more of an on-campus experience, but one that's more affordable," he said.

Griesen, who initiated the idea, said living on campus was a better experience for students than living at home.

"Research is clear that students who live on campus get more out of college than students who do not," he said.

In the fall of 1990, 639 entering freshmen at UNL were from the Lincoln-area high schools. Only a small number of them live on campus, which is something Griesen said he would like to change.

The proposal also would increase occupancy and revenues of residence halls, Griesen said. In the past two years, he said, the number of freshman has significantly declined because of the decrease in the number of Nebraska high school graduates.

The more occupants UNL has in its residence halls, Griesen said, the less effect inflation has on rates.

However, the goal of the program would not be to make money, he said.

"Even if this program just breaks even . . . it would be a positive thing if we could help more students to become more fully integrated into the campus environment," Griesen said. "I believe we need to do lots of different things to offer attractive packages to students that will make more of them live in our residence halls."

Griesen emphasized that the idea is only in its beginning stages. However, he said he hoped the proposal would be initiated on a trial basis next year with 30 to 40 students. If so, he said he would like to have information about it published in January in "The Good Life," the booklet about living in the residence halls.

Members of the enhancements committee expressed concern about whether full-time hall residents would be receptive to the idea, Griesen said. These and any other concerns will be explored.

For the idea to work, the students would have to be fully integrated with floor life, Griesen said.

"To have this work effectively, these students would have to be part of the gang," he said.

Limner said the economic impact was only a rough estimate because Miami was the home team and not as many people would be pumping money into hotels, cabs, souvenirs and restaurants.

But before worrying about all the money you're going to spend at the Orange Bowl, you have to get a ticket.

Joe Selig, ticket manager of the athletic ticket office, said that 60 University of Nebraska-Lincoln students paid the $30 for tickets before Thursday's 4 p.m. deadline. UNL had 10,000 tickets available for students.

Next, you've got to get to Miami. Laura Heimann, an auto travel counselor at the Lincoln branch of AAA, recommended a route through Kansas City, St. Louis, Illinois, Kentucky, Nashville, Atlanta and finally into Florida.

The trip, for drivers, is 1,619 miles. Because Nebraska fans are conscientious citizens and will drive 65 miles per hour, the trip should take about 24 hours.

By bus the trip is a little longer, 40 hours, and a round-trip ticket is $222. Flying would be the fastest, but a round-trip ticket will run $271 and, according to Bill Bennett, the president of Adventure Travel Inc., all flights already are booked.

Limner does suggest that students make hotel reservations now for their stay in Miami.

Students can get single and double rooms in Miami's art-deco area from $50 to $70 a night, she said.

The district, built during the 1930s and '40s, is located across from the beach and only 15 minutes from the stadium.

The area is popular among young people, Limner said, because of its clubs, cafes, bars and jazz rooms.

"It gets extremely crowded, and (there is) partying on the weekends and at night," she said.

While Husker fans were visiting Miami, Miller said, he didn't think they would encounter as much hostility compared to past years.

When Miami played Notre Dame, he said Irish fans incited the Hurricanes to a warlike attitude to the extent that many wore fatigues to the game.

But he said the atmosphere was different this year.

"Because we're expected to win by so much," he said, "most of the fans are not fiercely geared up."
