

Melomania

musically with the song going around and around. It is very original and doesn't get old to listen to.

"This Mystic Morning" is where Melomania begins to live up to its name. A very melodic bass holds the song together as the rest of the music weaves in and out with a sleepy Hawaiian twang. The relaxing lyrics combined with the rhythm of the softly tapped snare drum seriously will put you to sleep if you give them a chance.

Bassman sounds laid back on all the songs, but at times it seems as if he tries too hard to sound that way. A few of his lines are slurred, but it doesn't detract from the total composition whatsoever.

The mystic intro to "Are You For Real" makes one wonder if the song will come out of the clouds as fast or slow, but it becomes clear that Melomania doesn't want to be compared to the likes of the Charlatans U.K. or Ned's Atomic Dustbin. So of course the song is slower.

The only way actually to describe the sound of Melomania would be a slowed-down version of Blur, with an extremely mellow lead singer.

"Rise," the final song on the LP, is a perfect representation of the album's sound. The instrumentation, with its flighty guitar and its experimenting organ, sounds frighteningly familiar. It sounds like "The End" by the Doors. Whether intentional or not, it pays tribute to the legendary band and ends "The Darkside" in grand style.

Melomania has its own sound, and has created a brilliant LP, but Melomania isn't for everyone. The sound may be too non-conformist for some and not upbeat enough for others. But indeed, for Melomania fans, it is right where it should be.

"Here we saw a niche," he said, "and here we saw an opportunity to sort of re-invent the wheel.

"There's so much great music that is untested and unplayed," Tate said. "The Blaze is one of 25 stations throughout the United States that is taking this new tack as a rebirth of great days.

"We're capturing some of the same excitement that happened in the early '70s," Baptiste said.

After only 10 days, Tate said he saw a link between the audience and the radio station.

"It's very gratifying to see this," he said as he relaxed and leaned back in his chair.

"What we think we're doing," Tate said, "is perhaps awakening a gene in the children of the '60s."
