

Policy aids dual-career couples

By Sarah Scalet

The University of Nebraska-Lincoln Academic Senate approved in principle Tuesday a policy of responsiveness to dual-career couples at its last meeting of the academic year. In a dual-career couple, both partners work, which makes relocation difficult.

Assistant Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs Liz Grobsmith, who presented the draft of the policy, said the proposal was in response to specific concerns of some incoming faculty members.

The Dual Career Program would help partners of faculty members, who need not be legally married, find employment both at UNL and within the community.

In addition to helping partners find employment, the program would offer qualified partners one-year faculty fellowships.

With the approval of the department, qualified partners would have the opportunity to interact with colleagues, attend seminars and have a base to pursue continuing employment.

The policy was referred to the executive committee for further discussion.

In other business, George Tuck stepped down from his position as senate president. He is replaced by Royce Ballinger.

Sally Wise, an associate professor of law and director of the law library, was elected president-elect of the senate. Wise will assume the presidency in one year.

Tuck said she was the first woman named president-elect, as far as he knew.

Union Board shuffles groups' offices

By Sarah Duey

Despite the protests of about 20 RHA supporters, the Nebraska Union Board voted Tuesday to move the association's office to a smaller space in the union.

In an open forum before the vote was approved, Matt Hammons, Residence Hall Association president, said such a move would restrict the group.

But board members approved moving RHA's office out of its current space and into a smaller office because the union needed more meeting space, they said.

Frank Kuhn, assistant director of Nebraska Unions, said the move would benefit the association.

"Whether they know it or not, RHA will be much better served than they think in room 237," Kuhn said.

Gary Doyle, president of the University Program Council, said that because his organization was supported by student fees, it needed to be moved from room 200 to the first floor so it would be more accessible to students.

Judith Kriss, interim coordinator of the Women's Resource Center, spoke in favor of moving the center from room 117 because she thought the organization could use more flexible space.

The board approved both moves.

attracted good people, and it's important we continue to do so."

Although Blank is the incumbent, he said he did not consider his reelection a foregone conclusion and was traveling throughout the large District 7 to share concerns about the university with citizens.

"I think I've contributed over the last six years, but I have more to contribute," he said. "The board is more cohesive and really willing to work."

"I'm looking forward to the next six years — if the voters want me back."

Osborne said the money was not necessarily pegged to cover Simanek's medical bills. It also could cover suffering from her injuries and lost wages from the time she was unable to go to work, he said.

"It is to be used in any way (the Simaneks) see fit," he said.

Kathy Simanek said she was unsure how the money would be used. The decision, she said, lies with her daughter.

In addition to letters and the money raised at this weekend's game, Simanek said her daughter had received a lot of support in her hometown, Malmo.

The citizens of Malmo sponsored a benefit dance and an auction of donated items several weeks after the attack to raise money, she said.

Simanek said citizens of the neighboring town of Weston also sponsored a benefit auction and dance for her daughter.

"The local community has been extremely supportive," she said.
