went to the victim, who was half-conscious, and was unsure whether or not she was breathing.

After the police arrived, John Walters said he aided in subduing Baldwin. The LPD officer had Walters pin Baldwin's arms behind his back, fearing that Baldwin was trying to reach his gun.

Mountain testified that the injuries have greatly affected her every area of her life. She testified that she remembered nothing that occurred during the assault; her earliest memories began around March 7, while she was in the Madonna Rehabilitation Center.

She told the court of her attempts to relearn even the most basic skills, such as her vocabulary, mathematical skills (including counting), short-term memory, concentration and motor skills. Mountain stated she even had to rediscover how to brush her teeth and her hair.

Perhaps the most frustrating part of the recovery is her inability to totally recapture her talents as a graphic artist, Mountain said.

The prosecution displayed several of her drawings, two done before the assault and one after (which was the artwork for her wedding). She stated that she has great difficulty in capturing the 'life-like quality' of objects, and that she is incapable of seeing the details in what she draws.

The decline in her skills has led to great frustration and depression, coupled with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). It interferes with her ability to work part-time as a graphic artist with the Lincoln Journal-Star as well as in her dealings with co-workers and friends.

However, she remained optimistic about the future.

"Hopefully after this is over I'll become emotionally okay," she said.

Police reports will highlight regents meeting

By Mindy Wilson
Staff Reporter

An amendment that would increase the information released on campus police reports will be discussed by the University of Nebraska Board of Regents Saturday at its June meeting, a university official said.

J.B. Milliken, the corporation secretary for the board, said that the amendment would release student names with campus police reports.

But, Milliken said, the release of all reports would not be made mandatory.

And, he said, the identity of victims and informants could be protested.

Each campus would define the circumstances for the release of such information, Milliken said.

Ken Cauble, director of the University of Nebraska-Lincoln Police Department, said that he did not believe the amendment would change any procedures already being followed at the university.

Names on reports are already a matter of public record, and on the reports, Cauble said.

Other action on the agenda:
• The board plans to approve leases

for restaurants in the City Nebraska Union's new food court. Milliken said that the board would approve both Imperial Palace as the Chinese restaurant for the food court and a Mexican restaurant, which has not yet been chosen.

• Other items on the agenda, Milliken said, include the proposal of the 1993-94 operating budget and the approval of next year's budget.

• Next year's faculty and staff salaries also will be submitted for the board's approval, he said.

meet with the candidates.

"We have made an effort to include women and minorities in the pool and are making sure they are fully considered," O'Hanlon said. According to O'Hanlon, there are several important qualities that UNL is looking for in a new athletic director.

The athletic director must be a good manager and must have good fund-raising skills, he said. And he or she must be able to represent UNL in the field of intercollegiate athletics throughout the state and the nation.

O'Hanlon said the director also should be confident and have a good vision for the future, since the athletic world is changing rapidly. The athletic director is responsible for the management of the entire athletic department, including the budget, fund-raising and the selection and supervision of coaches and personnel, O'Hanlon said.

The director also negotiates game schedules and television coverage of events as well as selects representatives to attend NCAA conferences.

Once the final list is turned over to the chancellor, he will take over the process, deciding when interviews will be held and when the announcement of the new athletic director will be made.

Spanier's recommendation for the position must be approved by the NU Board of Regents.
