Registration cuts fee, plans speedier system

By Dionne Searcey

UNL students with schedule problems will save $5 this semester when they go through drop and add sessions.

Tony Schkade, assistant director of registration and records, said the university dropped the $5 fee students normally paid to change class schedules at the beginning of each semester.

This year's 7.5 tuition increase will cover the drop and add fee, he said. Drop and add sessions begin Tuesday.

Schkade said free drop and add sessions would benefit students who graduate before a new student information system is installed in three or four years.

"People who go through drop and add will have some benefit before the new system is up and running," he said.

The new system will make schedule changes easier, Schkade said. The details of the system have yet to be ironed out, and officials are considering several different programs.

One program would let students make schedule changes by using special computers on campus, he said. Another program would allow students to drop or add classes using a touch-tone phone.

For now, Schkade said, plans for the system are on hold while administrators wait for bids from companies who can install the system. The NU Board of Regents then must vote on the bid.

Once the system is installed, Schkade said, it would be some time before it works smoothly.

"You can't just jump in and load it and say, 'Let's get going,'" he said.

WRC unveils new name, programs

By Deb McAdams
Staff Reporter

The Women's Resource Center has undergone a bit of a transformation and has emerged with a new name: the Women's Center.

Director Judith Kriss said the name was changed to emphasize that the Women's Center is a place to meet others and exchange ideas — and a place open to everyone.

Kriss said she also saw the center, in room 340 of the Nebraska Union, as a clearinghouse for all types of information for everyone to use.

Kriss, a member of the Chancellor's Commission on the Status of Women, said the center's atmosphere would depend on the people who use it.

Individuals may volunteer, serve internships or seek positions on the center's advisory board. Members of the board will be appointed this fall.

Programs and resources already in place include counseling and referral services, literature and periodicals, and support groups and workshops. Videotapes, such as "Still Killing Us Softly — Images of Women in Advertising," as well as a VCR and television, are available.

Established support groups include Rape Survivors, Adult Children of Alcoholics, Non-Traditional Students, Single Mothers, Lesbian Discussion and Women for Sobriety.

Groups may be formed for those with eating disorders and for survivors of incest, Kriss said.

The center will provide support and counseling for victims of sexual assault as part of the Rape Education Project, a joint effort with the Association of Students at the University-Nebraska and the University Health Center.

A brown bag lunch series, "Women in Perspective," will encourage communication among and about women, Kriss said. The series is scheduled for Tuesdays from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. Discussion topics include family values, dual career families, women in politics and health issues, such as depression, breast cancer and PMS.

Chancellor Graham Spanier will attend the group discussion Oct. 6.

The center plans to announce workshops about assertive communication and self-esteem and a roundtable discussion of women's research projects.

A workshop and support group will be offered to help create a network of women in leadership roles.

Graduate Women in Science, a national organization, also will use the center as a meeting place and a mailing address.
