"For the most part, though, we didn't see blatant disregard," he said. Cacak said he believed the program was successful.

"We wanted to put a warning out there so people know they are doing something wrong, and they can make a change," he said.

Cacak said UNL police also had success in promoting the remote parking lots on campus.

The remote lots, located on 14th and New Hampshire streets, Court Street between 17th and 14th streets, and a lot on the west side of 17th Street, south of the Bob Devaney Sports Center, still have empty spaces.

More remote permits have been sold this year than in the past, Cacak said, but many stalls are still open.

Many students are exchanging their commuter permits for remote lot permits, he said.

The cost to park in a remote commuter lot for one year, he said, is only $17. For a year-long commuter permit, students pay $54.

The biggest advantage, Cacak said, is that stalls always are open, and commuters can avoid wasting their time searching for parking spots.

"It's the best deal," he said. "It's hassle-free — all you have to do is just drive and park."

University bookstores guard against thieves

With more than 23,000 UNL students buying books during the first week of classes, the University Bookstore and Nebraska Bookstore are keeping their guards up.

Dick Lewis, operations manager for the University Bookstore, said security was a concern.

The University Bookstore fends off shoplifting by keeping two police officers in front of the store and one in the back, he said.

The officers watch for shoplifters and keep an eye on backpacks belonging to students in the store, Lewis said. An alarm system also alerts the officers if someone tries to leave the store without paying for an item.

The bookstore uses the police officers for the first three days of class.

In past years, Lewis said, there has been no need for the extra security later in the semester.

"It really slows down at the end of the first week," he said, "and we still have the alarm system."

The Nebraska Bookstore is less obvious with its security.

"We don't have police, but we have extra temporary help who are trained to watch the store," Gretchen Monroe, a bookstore employee, said.

These undercover "security guards" are employed during the week before classes start and the first week of school. They are hired for regular jobs, like cashiers, but are taught to watch for any problems that may occur.

Full-time employees also watch. "The temporary and full-time personnel are good at watching for trouble," Monroe said.

Jerry Huber, president of the Beef Club and director of Gillette Dairy Co., said he, too, would have preferred that the athletic director vacancy had been filled from within.

"I just don't see how you fix something that's running well," Huber said. "I only hope (Byrne) can do half as well as Bob Devaney."

Huber, who said he had not yet met Byrne, said he also thought Papik was the best-qualified person for the job.

"We thought he was at least as qualified as the other finalists for the position," Huber said.

Hergert and Huber agreed that Byrne would need support from both fans and administrators to be successful.
