Modern music set for weekend

Contemporary music will be performed this weekend by a group that has a repertoire of more than 150 compositions and has earned an international reputation for its concerts.

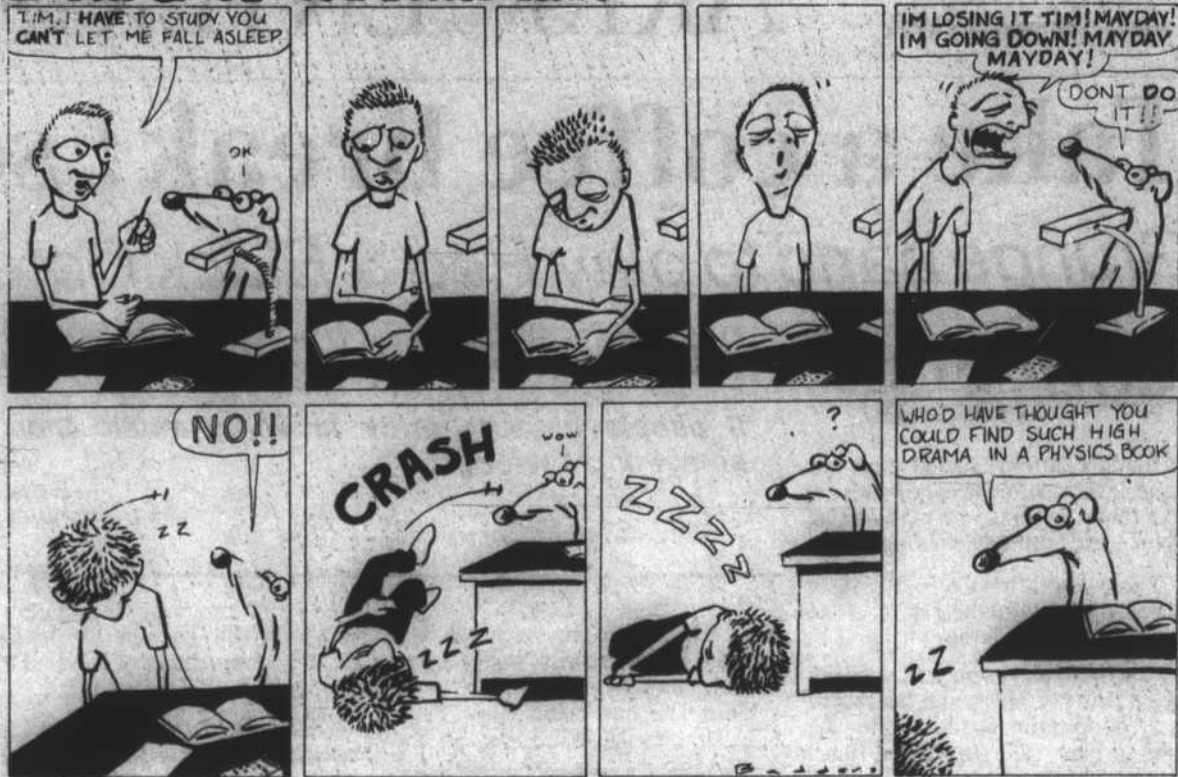

Zeitgeist, a Minneapolis-based ensemble of four musicians, plays works by living composers only. In past 20 years, more than 50 American composers have been commissioned to create new works for the group.

One of the group's biggest accomplishments is disproving the notion that contemporary music must be dissonant and dry. Instead, the group produces lyrical and engaging sounds with keyboards, percussion and winds.

Not only will the group perform at the Carson Theater Saturday at 8:00 p.m., they will give a mini concert at the Zoo Bar from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. Tickets for the Saturday performance can be purchased at the door prior to the show or at the Lied Center Box Office today.

World-class opera performer to bring talents to Lied Center

It's not every day that an audience in Lincoln can listen to a world-class opera singer.

Even less of an opportunity generally exists for Nebraskans to hear one of the great opera voices of the 20th century. But once again, the Lied Center for the Performing Arts delights in giving a Lincoln audience an extraordinary opportunity to experience the talent of Leontyne Price Sunday at 7 p.m.

Though she technically retired from the operatic stage after a series of performances of "Aida" at New York's Metropolitan Opera, Price still makes a limited number of appearances, one of them being the Lied Center two seasons ago.

Price was considered by many critics to be one of the great Verdi sopranos throughout the 1960s, 70s and early 80s, and her voice has received rave reviews at all the world's major opera houses.

Price will perform a program featuring American songs and spirituals that reflect her background growing up in Laurel, Miss., as well as music that made her famous as an opera singer. Tickets are $32, $28, $24 and half price for students.
