Enrollment may drop marginally

From staff reports

The University of Nebraska-Lincoln sent out 19,363 registration forms for the fall semester, down 180 from last year, an official said.

Earl W. Hawkey, UNL's director of registration and records, said decrease represents only about 1 percent of UNL's student population.

"You always have a little fluctuation," he said. "Basically it comes out to less than 1 percent."

Hawkey predicted UNL's final registration would be higher than the number of registration forms sent out.

"We still have general registration," he said. "We always pick up quite a few students there."

Hawkey said graduate students were the largest group expected to register for classes during general registration.

"Usually only about half of the graduate students pre-register and the rest register during general registration," he said.

Last year 19,543 registration forms were sent out in August, he said. UNL's final registration was 24,382.

In 1990, 19,262 registration forms were sent out. UNL's final enrollment was 24,237.

Hawkey said registration forms for this year still were being returned. The final count on enrollment will not be available until UNL's census on the sixth day of classes, he said.

Fraternity rush lasts whole year

By Amy Hopfensperger
Staff Reporter

The end of summer also means the end of the bulk of fraternity rushing, an Interfraternity Council officer said.

Shawn McCartney, overall Interfraternity rush co-chairman, said fraternities could pledge men throughout the year, but houses usually filled up with summer applicants.

Of the more than 600 summer rush applicants, 526 have already pledged a house, he said.

"Not many houses actively rush in the fall because most of the houses are full from the summer classes even though it is a year-long process," he said.

The number of pledges a University of Nebraska-Lincoln fraternity can take is not limited, unless by the local chapter, he said.

McCartney said some houses still would accept pledges after their houses were full. Those pledges must usually live in the dorms, he said.

Fraternity summer rush differs from the formal rush parties sororities hold to get new members.

During the summer, fraternity members travel around Nebraska to recruit students, not only to their fraternity, but also to the greek system as a whole.

Fraternity rush involves multiple rush parties and functions throughout the summer designed to interest fraternity recruits, or rushees, in a particular house.

Of UNL's 28 fraternities, only 26 participate in summer rush. The chapters of Alpha Phi Alpha and Kappa Alpha Psi distribute membership invitations to rushees after the first semester of each academic year.

McCartney, a senior criminal justice major and Lambda Chi Alpha member, said recent high school graduates were the major rush participants.

"Sometimes you'll see the older guys, the sophomores or the juniors, out there because they may have changed their minds or now have different views than they once had," he said.

Second semester fraternity rush is a scaled-down version of summer rush, Thad Follett, overall rush co-chairman, said.

"After the first semester, we just start the entire application process all over again, but not as many people are involved and not as many people pledge," Follett, a senior business major and Sigma Phi Epsilon member, said.

As overall rush chairmen, Follett and McCartney established the basic guidelines for fraternity behavior and monitored the progress of rush during the summer.

But McCartney said their watchdog roles were limited.

"Overall, it was a good summer," he said. "The rules were followed, and we were strict about those. Of course we heard about a few minor incidents, but we didn't have any real problems."
