

Zoo

"I'm a Zoo Bar booster," she said. "I can go anywhere in the U.S. and tell people I live above the Zoo Bar and people go, 'Wow, I'd like to play there some day.'"

Hundreds of lucky musicians get that wish fulfilled every year. The result is a diverse range of music.

Besides blues, the Zoo plays host to rock, jazz, reggae and soul bands.

This year, Boehmer commemorates the Zoo's 20th anniversary with a calendar filled with photographs of artists in action at the Zoo.

Ask Boehmer about the legends who have headlined the Zoo and he'll rattle off a list as long as the narrow bar room.

Some keep coming back to play at the Zoo, including the Chris Durante Group, Lucky Peterson and Jimmy Thackery.

Thackery was not surprised to hear Boehmer had received the award.

"He's long overdue," Thackery said. "That guy's been doing this in the same place with the same enthusiasm for as long as I've been traveling on the road—and that's a long time."

Wagon Train Project debuts

Artists discover Midwest secret

Amy Lamphere was a dancer. "Well, I was a dance wannabe more than I was a dancer," she said. "But what happily happened to me was I had a knee injury—that got me into arts administration."

She has worked in that field ever since in New York, Minneapolis and in her native Lincoln where she worked until September as Director of Development and Public Relations at the Lied Center for Performing Arts.

Now she's stepping out with her own company, The Wagon Train Project, which brings the Beppie Blankert Dance Company to the Carson Theatre tonight.

The Wagon Train Project is responsible for the company's entire American tour, for which Lamphere wrote a proposal two years ago.

She said tonight's show is the first official production of the Project, which also brought Frank Conversano to the university last March.

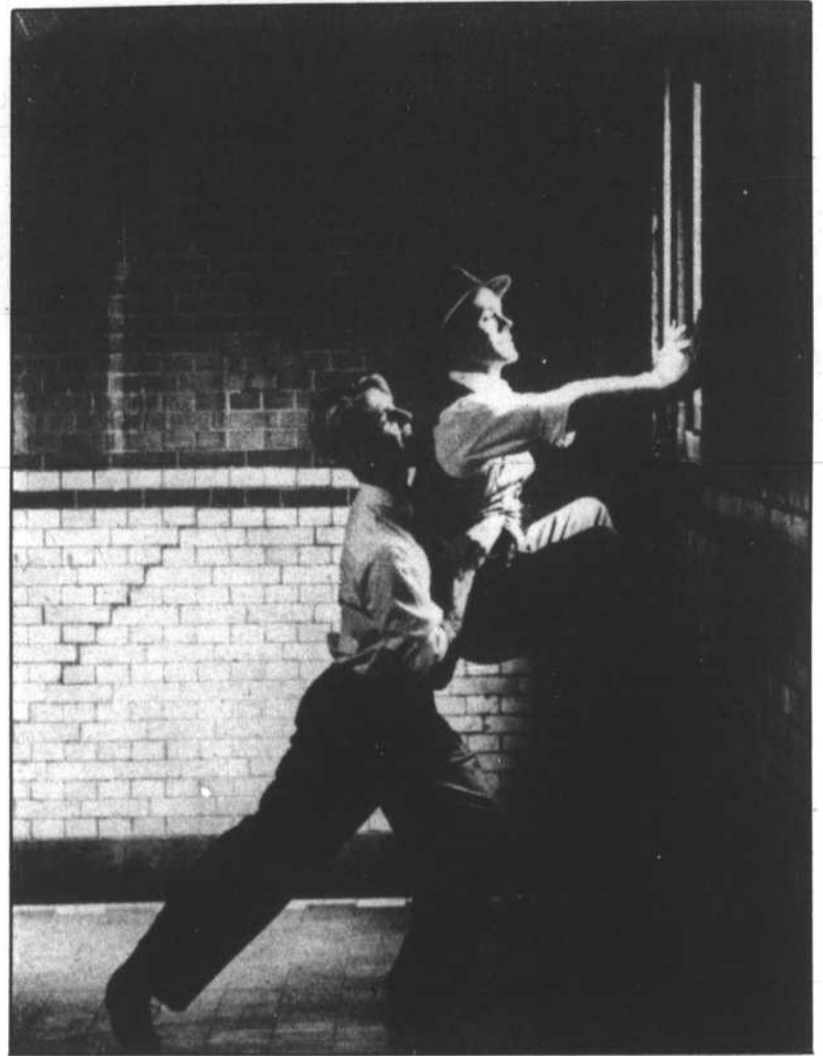

Conversano choreographed "Dukin" to the music of Duke Ellington and used five local businessmen as his dancers.

"It was a wonderful example of how everyone can be a dancer," Lamphere said.

And Conversano's approach is one that the Project would like to emulate.

"We want to bring artists into the community to create and exchange," Lamphere said. "So that the artist gets as much out of it as the community."

"Some of these artists may never have been to the Midwest or out in the country at all. We want to let them in on the secret."

Fabian Galama and John Taylor dance in the Beppie Blankert Dance Company. The Company performs tonight in the Carson Theatre under the auspices of the Wagon Train Project.

The Project plans to bring Bill Young, a New York choreographer, to Lincoln in November to work with dancers here and in Omaha on a duet he created.

And in December, Sanghi Wagner—also from New York—will do a solo movement workshop with all who are interested in dance, not just dancers.

"We really need a grassroots building of an arts community," said Lamphere, who fears that too many dancers in Nebraska currently have to move elsewhere to study and work.

"We hope to put together a monthly series of residencies," she said, "a new mode of artist's colony."

"An artist's colony isolates the artist so they can work in peace."

The Project's goal will be to bring the artist into contact with the local community in a way that will benefit all concerned, she said.

Today's show, entitled "Ives" in tribute to American composer Charles Ives, begins at 8 p.m.
