On a big stage, an actor must be all elbows and knees if the people in the back are going to get the jokes.

Up close an actor must be all eyebrows and lips.

Audience members, even in the back, can see every expression of the actor's face, every twitch of the lip, every line of the brow.

Pacing, blocking, timing — everything changes on the small stage. "Mike and Susan," and the the final one-act, "The Tiger," made the most appropriate use of the stage with excellent footwork by the players and some genuinely memorable moments from Judd Fetters and Don Wright, respectively.

But "The Enchanted Mesa" was poorly chosen for the small stage, besides being a rather uninteresting and poorly written piece.

Part of the evening's difficulties will already have been solved by this writing, no doubt. The show seemed to be working out some kinks that first night.

In all, the production seemed a little rushed. With putting up a stage and rehearsing all at once, Silver definitely had his hands full.

A little more time for working might have done the trick.

In all, the production survived the intrusion of the TV camera from hell, opening night jitters and some apparently last minute cast shifting, quite admirably.

Once director and cast have learned their way around the stage, we may expect better and better things from Lincoln's newest theater.

Alternative

"I'm pleased to have it happening," George said. "'No Alternative' can go a long way to raise consciousness. It can relate how to deal, live and work with people who have AIDS."

McCallum said he appreciated the initial support of AIDS awareness by the artists on the album.

"It's a nice thing when you have artists who are so strong to get together to donate new songs for this album," he said. "The proceeds of the album are going to a good cause, too."

McCallum said by using the album to raise AIDS awareness, the effort was targeting more college students.

"This is very specifically attracted to college students," he said.

"By localizing the focus of this project, we can further heighten their awareness."

George said the young adult population was an important group to inform because they were the counted the highest among people with AIDS.

"It's great to get attention in their teens to their 30s," he said. "This age group is also helping people understand the need of charitable giving."

"Even if they can't donate a lot of money to big events they can contribute on a smaller scale," he said.

The all-ages listening party Monday begins at 10 p.m. at The Edge. McCallum said he would put the album on sale at midnight.

"We plan to raise a few hundred dollars while providing information that is both informative and enjoyable," he said.

McCallum said the support he received from the local businesses was vital to the fundraising effort. The Edge will be donating drink proceeds to the foundation, he said. The Planet was also providing free air time and live call-ins to the event.

"This is a very nice community awareness project," he said. "There is an intense attraction to do so much good."

George said he appreciated the organizations who were making the fundraiser possible.

McCallum said he was encouraged by the opportunity to involve smaller businesses in the project. He said there was almost a mandate to provide assistance.

"Individual artists and local businesses can get a positive feel about intervention if motivated to do so."
