Buildings honor UNL contributors

While the names of students, professors and even classes can change from semester to semester, the names of buildings stand eternal.

Walking amid these buildings, University of Nebraska-Lincoln students may wonder how some individuals came to be immortalized in bricks and mortar.

Some City Campus buildings are named for former chancellors such as E. Benjamin Andrews, Samuel Avery, Allen Benton and Edmund Burke Fairfield.

Mari Sandoz and Willa Cather residence halls are named for famous Nebraska authors.

Others have gone a less traditional way to get a building named for them—they paid for it. Milton Wick donated $500,000 for a new alumni center, with each of his sons matching the donation.

Some UNL structures have a nobler history. They are named for former faculty or students who contributed to the university. Among these contributions are some interesting stories.

When the NU Board of Regents decided to name the first men's residence hall after John Selleck, who had been the driving force in its construction, he was surprised. "Wait, I'm not dead yet!" he

The mornings will be devoted to the class room courses leaving plenty of time for other planned and unplanned activities with the Russian students.

The total cost for the eight week course, books, room and board, bicycle rental, airfare: Only $2395

A local tour package and a weekend in St. Petersburg are offered at $150 each as optional extras. Nine credits possible for the eight week Russian language program from the State University of New York (SUNY) New Paltz for an additional fee of $150/credit.

Bjorklund

Bjorklund's statements should not be used because his statements were given in exchange for cigarettes and Diet Pepsi.

Colborn then asked the judge to allow testimony by a corrections officer, who said Bjorklund told her he could escape and harm a nurse if he chose to.

Helvie argued the corrections officer did not inform Bjorklund of his rights so the testimony should not be allowed as evidence.

Endacott said he would rule on the suppression motions in a written statement in the next couple of days.
