tant in Willows Residence Hall, said alcohol did not cause problems on his coeducational floor.

"If Iowa State was dry, my job would be much tougher," he said. "The way I see it is if people are going to drink, the fact they can drink in the den gives them more responsibility."

Grant "Junior" Brickley has lived in the residence halls for six years. He said the alcohol policy encouraged students to continue living on campus.

"There are enough parties to keep people in dorms," Brickley, a senior finance major, said. "It encourages people to stay in the dorms."

Murray Williams, a sophomore journalism major, said allowing students to drink on campus was a realistic way to deal with a potential alcohol problem.

"When you can do stuff like this on your floor, you want to stay on your floor," Williams said. This reduces the risk of drunk driving, he said.

Tony Carlton, a junior athletic training major, agreed.

"It's better to be here than be out driving," he said. With a dry policy, "there would be more problems. They are going to drink anyway."

Although alcohol is permitted, Ingraham said, guidelines are enforced.

- Alcohol consumption by minors.
- Large parties.
- Open containers in hallways or public places other than the floor den.

- Single alcohol containers of more than 1 gallon, including kegs and party balls.

Most students don't drink during the week, said Glen Rosenhamer, a sophomore environmental engineering major. Having alcohol in the residence halls doesn't hamper students' academics, he said.

M-Shop

Across campus in the Iowa State Memorial Union basement, about 200 people crowd into M-Shop — a popular night entertainment spot on the ISU campus for 20 years.

M-Shop is the only club minors can legally attend in Ames, and there are rarely problems with minors drinking, said Rusty Poehner, M-Shop coordinator.

"We are hounds," she said. M-Shop was the former site of the union's maintenance shop. In 1974 the room was turned into a club.

Poehner said allowing minors in was one reason M-Shop had been consistently successful.

"There's a certain glamor to be able to hang in a mixed crowd," she said.

Barb Mitchell has been coming to M-Shop throughout her college career. Now 21, Mitchell, a senior architecture major, still comes to M-Shop to listen to bands.

Kristin Degrande, a junior community regional planning major, transferred to Iowa State from a dry campus in Minnesota. She said it was convenient that alcohol was served at M-Shop.

"The main reason for coming here is the music," she said.

At about 10:30 p.m. Friday,

Poehner sees a man drinking without an armband. After discussing it with him, she discovers the bartender made a mistake and didn't give him an armband, even though the patron was of legal drinking age.

That is an example of an M-Shop problem, Poehner said.

"We handle things internally."

Administration

That type of self-enforcement is imitated throughout the ISU campus. It makes students more responsible, which is a good way to control alcohol problems, said Chuck Cychosz, ISU coordinator of alcohol and substance abuse programs.

"If your friends tell you to back off, you're having too much, that's a powerful message," he said.

Despite the self-control exercised by students, Cychosz said there was an alcohol problem at ISU.

"I think we are pretty typical of large Midwestern universities," he said. "We have a problem."

Loras Jaeger, director of ISU public safety, agreed there was a potential problem, but he said it was one all colleges faced.

"You would be fooling yourself if you said there was no alcohol in the residence halls at the University of Nebraska," he said.

no fight and the only person at the motel was Worthy, Casady said.

Casady said only one person present at the party gave a complete description of the events. A suspect is currently at large, he said, but police have a vehicle description.

At a Monday afternoon press conference Nebraska football coach Tom Osborne gave the team's version of the events.

Osborne said a woman entered a hotel room that was being used by several Nebraska football recruits who were accompanied by Husker players and began pointing out players to four men who were with her.

The players and the four men began leaving the room and one of the men punched a Nebraska player in the head.

A fight ensued which resulted in Muhammad and Worthy's injuries.

After the fight, the players reportedly borrowed a car from another UNL student to drive a player to the hospital.

The players said the car was being followed by another car and they received a call on the cellular phone inside the car.

The people in the trailing car said, "we've got you in our sights," and the players interpreted the call as a threat.

Osborne said the players stopped the car, got out and a gun accidentally discharged.

"It was an accident," Osborne said, "the gun was not shot at anyone."

Osborne said the call turned out to be a joke because people in the trailing car apparently knew the person who owned the borrowed car, which is how they knew the cellular phone number.

"From what I knew of the incident at the hotel, the players didn't do anything wrong," Osborne said.

Osborne said the Husker players involved in the incident intended to file charges.

Combs

educate voters to the issues, he said.

Combs addressed few foreign issues but said the United States should be militarily strong and a leader internationally. The nation should focus on improving problems at home, he said.

Education is important to him, Combs said. He said schools shouldn't be associated with weapons, day cares and illiteracy.

Combs said he stood up for the right to own a gun, but the right gets out of hand when people carry around Uzis, and drug dealers are armed better than police.

Welfare and prisons should be reformed to help provide a second chance, Combs said, not a way of life.

Combs said he wanted the streets to be safe both day and night. He said he advocated the Three-Strikes program and the recently signed Brady Bill.

"Granted, it doesn't take a genius to criticize; anyone can do that," he said. "However, it does take a strong individual to stand up to what is not right in our society and take bold action to see that it improves."

rived got into a fist fight, Casady said.

One party crasher pulled a knife and assaulted Worthy, a 20-year-old redshirt freshman on the football team, Casady said.

Worthy was treated and released from St. Elizabeth Community Health Center with a minor wound to his lower right back.

Another person at the party, who Casady thought to be Muhammad, was pushed against an 18-by-48 inch window of an adjacent motel room, causing it to break.

Hospital personnel informed police that Muhammad, 20, was treated and released for lacerations to his right hand. Muhammad told police he thought his hand was cut during the fight, but didn't know how, Casady said.

When officers arrived, there was
