he said. Characters include dwarfs, elves and humans. The book's vivid imagery, characteristic of Frye's work, makes the characters come alive.

When Frye isn't writing, much of his time is spent working with youth.

For the past several years, he has worked with at-risk kids. This work inspired him to create Kastleland, an anti-drug camp program. Through Kastleland, much storytelling and songwriting comes in.

"At the camp we put on quite a show. I tell stories and we have costumes of knights and dragons and those sorts of things. The kids really get into it."

Frye is currently working with gifted kids on English and creative writing through a mentoring program in the Lincoln Public Schools.

Frye's desire to work with young people grew out of his own life experiences.

"When I was a kid I became pretty involved in drugs and alcohol. Fortunately, I met some cool people that showed me I didn't need those things in my life."

After becoming a youth worker, Frye said he began to realize that he could offer a unique perspective to the youth with whom he worked.

"Kids are going to be more likely to listen to someone who can really relate to them and to someone who has been there. They're not going to pay much attention to someone who has never touched drugs."

Frye said his latest adventure was the development of an anti-drug video game called Kastleland. The game is based on his camp program.

"The game deals with real problems that kids face, but in a fun way."

Although the Kastleland idea is a creation of Frye's, he said the work on the video game was not his own.

"The kids I work with at school gave me a lot of the ideas and the artwork."

The game is being reviewed by five different companies, all of which seem interested, he said.

Frye said he was also working on another novel, but not by himself.

"This novel is based on the video game, and one of my students and I are writing it. It's fun."

"I write a couple of chapters and then he writes a chapter or two."

Although Frye is not sure exactly what he will be doing in a few years, he said he would definitely be writing.

"Eventually I would like to write full time," he said.

Frye said he also wanted to continue reaching young people, especially through his writing.

"If my books can reach even one kid, then I've met my goal."

that to thank him. "Students usually came to express their gratitude for the fact that they discovered themselves," he said. "They did not know they were capable of doing what we did."

Aluas said he loved his work with the students.

"I like to see the generation after me coming to accomplish something."

Cristina Moore, a junior music performance major and horn player, works with Aluas in independent study conducting classes.

"A lot of his force is just the respect he demands when he walks in the room," she said. "He not only demands it, he deserves it."

Moore said Aluas gave students self-esteem.

"You know when you've done a good job when you see the expression on his face," she said.

Moore said students went through a shock when Aluas began his work with the orchestra.

"He expected the parts to be done. That way, you'd have all the technical stuff out of the way to work on the music," he said. "They weren't used to that. They had done a lot of sight-reading in the past and they weren't prepared."

Praise came not only from the students, but also from other professors. Aluas said many people came up to him and thanked him for his work.

"I developed the orchestra so fast, so disciplined, so artistically, so academically and professionally," he said, "which was a major accomplishment."

Along with improving the University Orchestra, Aluas started a University Chamber Orchestra. His efforts paid off at a sold-out concert last fall that was followed by a packed house at a December concert.

"We had a full audience, and that is very important," he said. "It's nice when you see your work is recognized. It's nice to be able to make a difference."

Sophomore biology/pre-dentistry major and violinist Shannon O'Connor said Aluas' name might have drawn the larger audiences.

"He's drawing a lot more people to join the orchestra," she said. "He's also making it a stronger presence in the School of Music."

Aluas said after this year, the university orchestra compared to a professional orchestra. He will leave at the end of the year, and he hopes his students carry the skills they learned into their futures.

"I want them to think for themselves, never to be satisfied with status quo," he said, "to be disciplined and nothing they do to be superficial."

"I hate ignorance," he said. "I work with 70 people and none of them are."

Aluas said he would like to know he left behind 70 students who were going to be useful to society.

"I'm going to miss them." And he will be missed, Moore said.

"It's going to be hard to see him leave," she said. "He's done so much for the orchestra."

The University Orchestra will perform at Kimball Hall Friday at 8 p.m. Admission is free.
