The Sex Pistols. It's too bad CBGB's and Atlantic Records couldn't have dug up a few live songs recorded that have historical, cultural or artistic relevance for 1994's listeners. With every song overlapping contemporary useless rock music, such as Bon Jovi, the prospects of "Live At CBGB's" making any professional or unprofessional critics' lists are all but buried.

"Faraway, So Close" Soundtrack Sony Music

Thousands of U2 fans gasped aloud as demi-god Bono plummeted from the top of a looming statue of an angel falling to the streets below at the end of the band's video for "Stay (Faraway, So Close!)." It's not just a coincidence, then, that Wim Wenders, who has directed many of U2's videos, should produce a movie called "Faraway, So Close." And, of course, U2 would have to contribute a song or two since it seems to have become the band's hobby nowadays.

It's not coincidental either that Lou Reed, who stars in the movie, also should contribute a song. And, well, if he did, then Nick Cave, Laurie Anderson, Herbert Grönemeyer, Jane Siberry, Simon Bonney and the House of Love had to as well.

This Wenders' cocktail party gathering created a quite "angelic" compilation to complement the trials and tribulations of Wenders' fallen angels.

With a variation of U2's "Stay (Faraway, So Close!)" and "The Wanderer," starring Johnny Cash, this soundtrack earned its wings. Cash also mixes with the organic sounds of a very growly Cave in the title song "Faraway, So Close," which is not to be confused with U2's song, and the pondering Reed in "Why Can't I Be Good."

Combined with some ethereal orchestral selections for a celestial mood swing, it gives the illusion of a mental trip from passionate rock to classical harmony.

From a cynical spoken-word Cave in "Cassiel's Song" to the lullaby voice of Siberry, a musical tinkerbell in "Slow Tango," it's a trade-off between tarnish and purity.

It's almost like listening to a battle between good and evil with the wispy angel songs — dressed with gossamer harmony and passionate overtones — versus the catatonic vocals of Cave and Reed painted by the blackness of a tarnished soul.

"Faraway, So Close" is a very different soundtrack. The soundtrack is not trying to be a smash hit in itself, but, it still is powerful listening. The combination of instrumental and popular songs provides a balance of aesthetic audio beauty with enough inspiration for a few fallen angels themselves.

Snaps

You can use these lines to insult not only your friends, but their family, too. For instance, in the "Old Snaps" section, there's, "Your mother is so old, when Moses split the Red Sea, she was on the other side fishing."

Lastly, "Snaps" contains a six-page section about mastering the art of playing the dozens. Good advice is given, the most impractical being—"Wear a bulletproof vest if trying this in certain sections of the inner city."

I realized trading insults with someone can be considered a sport. But I have never realized what an honored, culturally enriching, complicated practice talking about other people's mothers is, and I'd like to thank the authors for telling me. I'm thinking about passing the word to the next busload of schoolkids I meet.

Of course, they may respond with a line like that from rapper Heavy D, who said in the book, "You're so stupid, it takes you an hour to cook Minute Rice."
