

High-energy hijinx between trio kicks boo-tay

When you get University of No-Learning football coach Tom Ozzyborne, men's basketball coach Dan Knee and women's basketball coach Angela Buck in the same room, you're asking for trouble.

But when you make them roommates you've got the ingredients for high-energy hijinx.

In Slick Finkelstein's new comedy-drama "Gender Equity Bites," this zany trio is united in a depiction of the trials and hilarity present in the world of collegiate coaching.

The story begins with the three coaches being forced to live together in order to compensate for the sharp reductions in their salaries due to gender equity.

The plot of the film revolves around not only the struggles the coaches deal with in their respective sports, but also how they deal with each other in such a strange environment.

This leads to madcap fun such as Bruised Pubick wearing Buck's dresses. In this writer's opinion, they all looked better than the real owner.

The wackiness reaches its peak as Ozzyborne repeatedly leaves the toilet seat up and an enraged Buck beats him senseless. But the two make up like the true sportsmen that they are.

The most poignant moments of the flick occur when Buck gives both Ozzyborne and Knee the Heimlich maneuver as both choke throughout the movie.

This lends an effective touch of sentimentality to this funny, funny, funny, funny, funny, funny, humorous, funny movie.

There are some problems with the film, however.

The romance between Buck and NUL Captain Greasy Spaniel is completely not plausible.

Also, a Nebraska men's basketball Final Four appearance? I've heard of "poetic license" but I think the writer is getting a little silly.

But all in all, this is an excellent film conjuring up images of the immortal "Three's Company," but I won't tell you who the sexual tension involves.

Screw basketball, Strikelane's Humper-lovin' mind in the gutter

Kornhumper basketball player Erick Strikelane, who also stars in the Florida Morons minor league organization, has decided to start taking strikes of a different kind.

The 6-foot-2-inch junior from Ballsview has recently been seen honing his bowling skills at the Easter Campus Nebraska Union.

"I'm the true renaissance man, baby," Strikelane said. "People don't get how tough bowling is. It's not just knocking over some pins. It's a way of life."

"You've got to be one with the lane and the ball and the pins and those funky shoes."

Strikelane then fell into deep meditation while humming "let's bowl, let's bowl, let's rock n' roll" over and over again.

Kornhumper basketball coach Dan Knee, who himself is an avid bowler, said any talk of his star guard taking up a new sport is "totally ludicrous."

"That's absolutely the most insane thing I've ever heard," Knee said. "I mean, the guy changes sports like I change underwear — once every two weeks." Strikelane said he did not appreciate Knee's comment.

"The guy doesn't know a friggin' thing about being a two-sport athlete," Strikelane said. "Come to think of it, he doesn't know a thing about being a one-sport athlete, either."

Nebraska bowling coach "Wild" Willy Straw said he would welcome

Strikelane to his team.

"This guy is one of the most kick-ass athletes I've ever laid my mother-grabbin' eyes on," Straw said. "I think with a little guidance from moi, Strikelane could go all the way."

Straw did not elaborate on what "all the way" is for a bowler. But Straw's definition apparently centers on moving out of one's parents' house and getting one's own place in the trailer park.

Strikelane, who chose bowling over badminton and water polo, said he will not stop with just bowling for Nebraska.

"Basketball is just a hobby for me," Strikelane said. "I'm looking to bowl for the Huskers for the next two years and then hit the pro circuit."

In order to avoid conflict with the baseball season, Strikelane said, he would have to budget his time wisely between basketball and bowling in the winter months.

"If there is ever a conflict as far as two tournaments going on," he said, "I am going to bowl every time. But I don't think scheduling will be a real problem. I mean the bowling team might compete at any time, but the basketball season gets over on the same weekend every year. I got a pretty good idea when the team will be done."

However, there is one downfall to bowling, Strikelane said.

"I tried to get Coach Straw to let me wear hightops when I was bowling," he said. "But he wouldn't budge. I've got to wear those stupid red, green and blue bowling shoes. I'm sure glad I like polyester or I'd really be screwed."

But, he said, that may soon be a fashion blunder of the past. Strikelane plans to introduce a new line of bowling shoes after establishing himself among the elite of the sport.

"I'm going to call them Air Spare," he said.

Although he seems set on picking up splits and automatic scorekeepers, Strikelane said, he was leaving his other options open for the future.

"I never know what's next," he said. "Maybe jai alai. Hell, maybe Pubick and I can get together. I can see it now. Ice dancing. Synchronized swimming. Maybe synchronized ice dancing."

"By the way, have you seen his bazooka?"

to reprimand Worst.

"Worst, you dog-lickin' pretty boy, dry up those tears," Knee said, as he lifted his middle finger to the janitors above. "You're a college basketball player. I mean you're a basketball player. I mean you're in college or somethin' like that. Anyway, get up and let's get back to practice."

Worst would have no part of Knee's instructions, pounding his fists into the hardwood floor of the Sports Center and sobbing uncontrollably.

Knee then stared at Worst for a second and then began taunting his player by yelling "hey, wu-SAY" over and over.

Jim Dandelion, a local radio sportscaster, saw the event and intervened.

"You leave Tom alone, you big bad man," Dandelion, with tears rolling down his cheeks, instructed Knee. "He's a good kid. He's just going through a tough time."

Dandelion helped Worst to his feet and escorted him to the locker room.

Knee said Worst's behavior and absence from the rest of practice would lead to a one-game suspension.

"I don't appreciate him leaving practice and that's all I will say about the matter, but if anyone has questions about how I turned the program around, ask them now," Knee said.

The fireworks continued between Knee and Worst during Wednesday's game with the Big Eight-leading Missouri Tigers, which was also the game in which Worst was to serve his one-game suspension.

With Nebraska leading 42-39 at halftime, Misery coach Storm Blewfart offered Worst $2,000 to suit up at halftime and play in the second half.

Worst accepted Blewfart's bribe. "I had to get some money before my NBA contract gets settled," Worst said after the game.

Blewfart's plan worked to perfection in the second half, as Worst started and played almost the entire half.

However, with 1:22 remaining and Missouri holding a 74-42 lead, Knee noticed Worst in the game.

After confronting Worst during a timeout, Knee went directly to the Tiger bench, pulled Blewfart out of the huddle and began beating him senseless.

After several blows to Blewfart's head and kicks to his stomach, Knee was pulled off the Missouri coach by the officials, scorekeepers and Dandelion, the announcer.

Knee was shouting, "Screw you, Storm," while Blewfart screamed "Touch my monkey."

Knee was to meet with Nebraska athletic director Will Burn today to discuss disciplinary actions.

As for Knee and Worst's relationship, the coach said a meeting between the two called by Dandelion would hopefully iron things out.

"We have to get through this conflict," Knee said. "We have a lot of season left. We still have a Big Eight tournament to win and another first round NCAA tournament game to lose."
