One individual in the tape has a board in his hand that's four feet long," Cauble said. "We have information that there was a female party there with a broomstick hitting people."

"There were some minor injuries, but nothing serious," Cauble said.

This semester, Cauble said, community service officers patrol areas near greek houses. Their purpose is security, but they can inspect greek houses.

But Cauble said the intent was to provide security, not to act as the "alcohol patrol."

"I believe in clean fun. I was in a fraternity when I was here, and we did things to each other, but no one ever got hurt," Cauble said. "Violence is never a good solution."

Griesen said he hoped the community service officers would serve as a deterrent against violations of the student code of conduct, such as on-campus alcohol use.

He said he had been receiving fewer anonymous tips about on-campus parties this semester. That is because "the great majority of greek houses are living within the code," he said.

Griesen said his office became aware of the frequency of code violations last year because of the large number of tips his office got.

"It became very evident last year after the Jeff Knoll incident that the actual number of incidents was far greater than the number of incidents reported," Griesen said.

After the Knoll incident, the number of violations reported increased, he said.

"People would call and say 'We heard there would be a party at XYZ house,' and we'd go check it out," he said.

Jayne Wade Anderson, director of greek affairs, would not comment on the alcohol use and fight at Theta Xi, but she said "things have gone fairly well this year. We haven't really had any incidents."

She said the greek affairs office approached code of conduct infractions no differently than in the past.

"We never stopped educating the students," she said. "We constantly re-educate groups each year in a wide variety of areas."

"It may be impossible to straighten or stop some students in some situations, no matter what you do."

said the patrol was treating the incident as "suspicious."

The Marshall family said Thursday they were not ready to make a statement, but Leonard said they were hopeful. He said the family had been contacting people who could have been in contact with Kendra Marshall.

Leonard said the family had been a tremendous help to the investigation.

"I'm doing it because it's my job," Leonard said. "They are doing it because it's the most important thing in their life."

Niemann said the search for Marshall was expanded Thursday to the borders of Nebraska. The search area will grow every day she is missing, he said.

Niemann said the Johnson Lake area had been searched extensively, along with side roads in the area. He said Interstate 80 was searched by air Thursday.

Nothing in the investigation had indicated Marshall's car had broken down along the road, Niemann said, but the patrol was trying to investigate all possibilities.

The family has said Marshall possibly stopped for gas somewhere along I-80 between Cozad and Lincoln, he said.

failed to cite the specific instances when violations occurred, and said he didn't understand the reasons for the lockout.

"If there haven't been problems before, I don't see why we're forced to do this now," Crawford said. "Somebody's looking to put us under."

Tejral agreed.

"It seems like a control issue," said Tejral. "They (campus recreation) don't want to attempt to see it our way, or even compromise."

"We're on double secret probation," said Tobin Watson, a senior engineering major.

Campus recreation restricted club activity because of "absence from the Sport Clubs Council meeting on Aug. 31, 1994, damage to university property, unauthorized access to the boat-house and unauthorized purchases."

The alleged damage to university property consists of a lock broken over the summer, Crawford said, although there is no evidence that crew members were involved.

Dorothy declined to release specifics regarding the other allegations, but said they were unrelated to the new policy.
