raigned at 2 p.m. today on numerous charges.

Originally from Clarks, Schlondorf was a third-year student during the 1993-1994 academic year, according to UNL student information. Schlondorf's parents declined to comment to the Daily Nebraskan Monday night.

The cross-town Lincoln chase involved every available city police officer and county sheriff's deputy. Lincoln Police Chief Tom Casady said.

The extra officers were needed to direct traffic at the intersection in south Lincoln and to keep more than 50 onlookers away from the scene.

cent citizen involved in one of these (incidents)," Casady said. "It was a very tense moment there for everyone involved."

Police seized two weapons, Casady said, the .45-caliber Thompson sub-machine gun replica that he allegedly used to shoot at Soflin, and a high-powered .30-caliber rifle.

Casady said the "Tommy Gun" had been seized from Schlondorf during another incident with UNL police.

"We've got some (indication) that this gun may have been used in a prior conflict that officers had with him when he tried to attempt suicide," Casady said.

The gun later was returned to Schlondorf by court order, he said. Schlondorf had no criminal record, police said.

UNL police said they had spoken with Schlondorf in 1993. University police refused to release further information and records about the former student Monday evening.

Chief Deputy Lancaster County Attorney John Colborn was investigating the 16th and R streets scene Monday night. He said his office could file charges today.

Event to raise funds for homeless

By Julie Sobczyk

Spending one night in the cold won't change Lincoln's homeless problem, but some believe it will help increase awareness about the problem.

Lincoln Mayor Mike Johanns announced Tuesday that Great Plains Winter SleepOut Day would be Sept. 30. He encouraged Lincoln citizens to participate in the annual event by sleeping outside for one night.

Michael Carpenter, chairman of the Lincoln Homeless Coalition, said homelessness was a big problem in Lincoln.

"Twenty-five hundred to 3,000 individuals will become homeless this year," he said. "Over half of these are women and children."

Factors such as income, higher housing prices, and domestic abuse lead to homelessness, he said.

The third annual SleepOut, organized by the Lincoln Homeless Coalition, is aimed at raising awareness about the homeless and raising money for shelters for the homeless, Carpenter said.

Those participating in the event will sleep outside in Antelope Park. Participants need to provide their own sleeping bags and blankets.

Participants raise money during the event by getting pledges, based on the number of hours they sleep out, or one-time donations. The proceeds will go to local homeless shelters. Corporate sponsors also donate money to the event.

Carpenter said the SleepOut was not designed to give participants a realistic experience of homelessness.

"The purpose of the SleepOut is not designed to be realistic," he said. "It's designed to create awareness. A lot of people who aren't service providers can get involved."

Carpenter said the coalition hoped to raise tens of thousands of dollars this year with the SleepOut.

He said $26,000 was raised last year and "almost $26,000 was raised the year before."

Carpenter said he was unsure of the exact number of people who would attend the event, but he expected at least several hundred.

Corporate sponsors who have donated to the SleepOut include First Tier Bank, National Bank of Commerce, Union Bank, Lincoln Telephone and the Lincoln Journal-Star.

Money raised during the SleepOut will go to Lincoln shelters such as the Friendship Home and the People's City Mission.

Marsha Cussen, a representative from the People's City Mission, said she was glad the event made others aware of the homelessness problem in Lincoln.

"Homelessness can reach anyone, like neighbors and friends," she said.

Other organizations that indirectly help homeless people, such as the American Red Cross, the Salvation Army, DayWatch and the Gathering Place, also will receive aid.

"The SleepOut helps raise awareness, and the money helps DayWatch stay open," said Nancy Erickson, a representative from DayWatch. "We need to do something about the homeless problem."

UNL to partake in exchange program

By John Fulwider

A new exchange program with the Indian Institute of Technology in Kharagpur, India, will give UNL business students an opportunity to share ideas with their Indian counterparts.

Two officials from the Indian college visited the University of Nebraska-Lincoln Monday to discuss an exchange program with College of Business Administration students.

The program, which would send UNL business students and faculty to India, would allow American and Indian participants to teach each other about business practices in their countries. An Indian businessman donated $2 million to each educational institution to make the program possible.

Vinod Gupta, chairman and chief executive officer of American Business Information, Inc., said he hoped his donation would foster increased cooperation and exchange of ideas between CBA and a newly expanded college of management at IIT.

K.L. Chopra, the president of IIT, said the program needed students who have completed a bachelor's of arts degree in engineering or science. He said the institute would like students with experience in a related industry.

At IIT, the business management college is small — having only twenty-three faculty members, he said.

Chopra said IIT was strong in technology management and analytic techniques but lacked experience in marketing and other non-technical aspects of management.

He said he hoped the strength CBA had in those areas could strengthen the programs at IIT. At the same, CBA students and faculty could learn from IIT's experts in technical management.

The exchange program will involve direct, practical experience with Indian industries, he said. For example, students might go to a steel company and work on a small project.

After the session with Chopra and Sanyal, Gupta shared his reason for donating $4 million to the two schools — and his vision for the program.

"I think that American business institutions are by far the best business institutions ... and we need this expertise in India," he said. "And that's why we are forming this operation with the University of Nebraska college of business so we can enlist the help of the faculty and students and have an exchange of ideas."

Series to diagnose health care

From Staff Reports

A symposium discussing health care and technological change will be held today at Kimball Recital Hall.

The symposium, at 3:30 p.m., is part of a series on health care.

Burton A. Weisbrod, director of the Center for Urban Affairs and Policy Research at Northwestern University, will be speaking. His address is titled "Health Care Reform and Technological Change."

The Department of Economics and the Center for Insurance and Risk Management in the College of Business Administration is sponsoring the symposiums, which are free and open to the public.

Donna Kennedy Marvin, a project assistant in the economics department, said her department was bringing the speakers to campus to provide students and faculty a perspective on health care reform that goes beyond politicians' sound bites and partisanship.

She said the department hoped to show the effects of the proposed health care reforms on the university community.

Three other symposiums will be held throughout the semester.
