String ensembles bring audience, performers toget

Two string ensembles will be joining forces tonight to kick off the Lincoln Friends of Chamber Music's 1994-95 season. The concert is anticipated to be exciting and educational for both the audience and performers.

The concert features the Angeles and the Alexander Quartets. The two groups will perform in Kimball Hall scparately and together as an octet Stephen Buhler, a University of Nebraska-Lincoln English professor, got involved with the Lincoln Friends of Chamber Music about five years ago when he first began teaching here. Buhler has become responsible for much the group's publicity in the last three years.

"My involvement was simply a realization that I cared about this music very much, but I was not very knowledgeable, and I had had limited exposure to it," Buhler said.

The Lincoln Friends of Chamber Music thought Buhler would be ideal for getting the word out because he is an English professor, he said.

Since its inception in 1981, the Alexander String Quartet has earned a well-deserved following. It was the first quartet to win the Concert Artists Guild International Award, and the first to win Britain's Portsmouth International String Quartet compe-

The Angeles Quartet came together for what was meant to be a one-time performance, but the rapport between the players during the concert led to their establishing a

Both groups, especially the Alexander Quartet, are interested in letting people know about their music, Buhler said. They want to help it seem as accessible as it genuinely can be, with a kind of teacherlike zeal. They can achieve this zeal because of the advantage they have of being in the smaller venues, like Kimball

"You're not just a consumer of the music, but a participant," he said.

"Rather than being what we too often become, passive consumers, -especially with 'serious' music where we don't dare involve ourselves here we can become, in a variety of ways, collaborators with the performers, who are themselves collaborating with the composers."

Unlike the other three concerts of

Despite the success of the Lied Center for Performing Arts, the Lincoln Friends of Chamber Music is still going strong after 30 years because of the intimacy of the smaller concert halls.

"You really get a sense of these people as other human beings," Buhler said.

Starting this year the Angeles Quartet will begin recording all of the quartets that Haydn ever composed. The recordings will eventually be available on compact disks.

The group thinks the project will take about seven years to complete. Buhler said this evening's concert would be like a preview to that
