

Jones

ahead of music that it perhaps was," Jones said.

Jones said he enjoyed the opportunity to work on another rock record. "I enjoy playing rock 'n' roll and being very loud and playing rhythmically, and that's the riff style I do indefinitely. It's just how I play rock 'n' roll."

Jones wanted to make it clear that Galás was the force behind "The Sporting Life."

"The essence of 'The Sporting Life' is the lyrics — the personal angle of Diamanda — with me just leaping around in the background going 'Go on! Go on!' and cheering from behind."

"The Sporting Life" again marks a new era in Jones' life, but he said new accomplishments reflected a natural progression rather than a dramatic change from his Zeppelin days.

"The people that got what we were doing shouldn't be surprised in the slightest," he said. "It's not more of the same, though. I haven't changed much since I did what I did then. I'm easy with both things, and I'm happy with what I did."

Jones keeps his past accomplishments and work in the past and doesn't plan on repeating them. Jones was not a part of the Page and Plant reunion tour and consequent album "No Quarter."

Led Zeppelin is the past, and the future holds new projects for Jones. He moves on, but he doesn't forget.

"There were many Led Zeppelin shows where we were really accepted. I do remember those with warm memories and pride," Jones said. "I have good memories of most of my projects."

His work with Galás will continue, but not in the sense that they have formed a band. Jones needs "someone else to play with now." He might work with an Internet "nerd" friend, Michael Penn.

Jones said the unvarying state of music in England might also change with the dawning of the Internet information age.

"There's still a great do-it-yourself thing here. The period of punk is almost on us again with kids making records in the bedroom and renting bands," he said.

While rock music remains "pretty boring," Indian, techno-dance rave and black British music are making their way onto England's music scene, he said.

"These artists are really getting active and buying computers and turning out fantastic stuff. They're revitalizing the '80s," he said. "It feels like '76 all over again."

Music still confronts society's problems, he said, but by 2000 the means of getting these messages to people who want to listen to them will be different.

"People that make minority music may find that they no longer have to convince a record company to give them a deal," he said. "They may just be able to put stuff on the network and have other people take it off."

With the help of the Internet, Jones said he hoped more people could be exposed to new, experimental musical forms.

"Internet is growing. It has a lot of potential. It's very young yet, and it's good to be getting to learn about technology from the start," he said.

"It's communication. Anything to do with communication is good, because it breaks down barriers."

Jones and Galás will perform on Sunday at the Lied Center at 8 p.m. All tickets are $15.

Diamanda

The singer said she was disgusted by people who blamed their lives on their parents.

"Any eccentricity of my personality I'm ready to take full credit for," she said.

That's quite a responsibility for someone as shocking as Galás. Her eccentricity extends beyond her music into her sexual life and her outlook on relationships.

"Sex is power. It also has a lot to do with games of power," she said. "I haven't evolved quite beyond that. I think a lot of people advance more spiritually than me."

"The way I look at things is so opposite from the mainstream-broader culture," she said. "I don't reconcile every time I have intercourse. I do not think of conceiving a child and family structure and my man and me doing the whole domestic thing."

Although she said she liked the idea of a relationship, she said she did not have time for a traditional one.

"I think of them (men) as rewards after tours. After three months of touring, I haven't been able to think of them seriously," she said. "Most of the men I've met have been far too jealous for me to waste my time."

Jones, one man with whom she has invested a great deal of time, certainly has not been a waste.

"John Paul Jones is a wonderful musician, and he's a great person," she said. "I don't think his peers in Led Zeppelin have the guts to do this nature of work."

Galás admires Jones' family life as well.

"He has a very strong wife and three daughters. They're very strong women. They're great," she said. "I've met two of them, and I love them."

Galás said she would continue working and touring with Jones while pursuing her solo interests.

The two will perform Sunday at 7 p.m. All tickets are $15.
