Cast clicks in tragic 'Legends'

Five Words: Tragic film, depressing but compelling.

With enough tragedy for a Shakespearean play, "Legends of the Fall" doesn't have a happy ending, or a happy middle, or a happy beginning, for that matter. But it is well-filmed and well-acted and presents an enticing tale.

Col. William Ludlow (Anthony Hopkins) retires from the Army after he fails to change the military's ill-treatment of American Indian tribes.

Ludlow builds a ranch in Montana and raises his three sons without the help of his wife.

When the youngest son, Samuel (Henry Thomas), brings his beautiful bride-to-be, Susannah (Julia Ormond), back to the Ludlow ranch, problems arise with his older brothers, Alfred (Aidan Quinn) and Tristan (Brad Pitt).

After Susannah arrives and the three brothers enlist in World War I, the Ludlow family meets with tragedy after tragedy.

It seems that no one can ever find happiness or contentment, and everyone's unrest revolves around the middle brother Tristan and his wild, untamable spirit.

Aidan Quinn is very good as the willful elder brother Alfred, whose own political ambitions conflict with his father's hatred of the government.

Julia Ormond is exceptional in her role as the idealistic Susannah, a woman from the East who ends up touching each brother in a different way.

And Brad Pitt, who is now popular enough to get top billing over Anthony Hopkins, lives up to his reputation. He nearly perfectly captures the essence of the indomitable and unpredictable Tristan.

But it is Hopkins who puts in the best performance. His portrayal of the rigid Colonel, a man whose sense of equality and justice is frightfully ahead of his time, is captivating. Hopkins gives his all to the role, getting even better after the powerful cavalry officer is reduced to a hobbling, near-speechless old man.

The movie was well-filmed, showing a wonderful contrast between the natural splendors of isolated Montana country and the horrific trenches of war-torn France. There were also many eccentric camera angles and lighting adding to the film's drama.

Although the plot was very engrossing, it seemed anti-climactic and dragged a bit in the latter half of the film.

But it jumped back in there and gave the audience an ending profound enough to tie the film in a sensible knot.
