expanded from 15 to 30 computers. Swanson said the Computing Resource Center might provide newer computers for the room.

Also, CRC may decide to staff the new room because of the additional computers. If the room was staffed, Swanson said, better technology, such as laser printers, could be available.

Swanson said the changes were being made partially in response to student complaints that the union was drab and boring.

"This generation of students expects more," he said. "After you've seen other public facilities, the union is not as exciting as it was to students 20 years ago.'

The project is in the early stages. Swanson said the Union Board of Directors prepared a 150-page proprogram statement last year that outlined improvements.

Before project designs can be drawn up, the program statement must be approved by the NU Board of Re-Construction began on the Nebraska Union's last expansion in 1967 and was completed in 1969.

On the first floor, parts of the current main lounge, TV lounge and food court, which used to be an outside patio, were enclosed to provide more space for activities.

Before the expansion, the north half of the second floor did not

James Griesen, vice chancellor for student affairs, will decide when to present the program statement to the board.

"I hope we can take this to the board in April," Griesen said. He said he was a strong proponent of union expansion, but he wanted to make sure he had a plan for paying for it that was acceptable to both students and the regents.

In order to succeed, the abortion rights movement must "band together
