

City committee: Religious leaders must preach solidarity

By Paula Lavigne
Senior Reporter

The mayor's Community Conciliation Committee convened Tuesday night after four months of debate in a barrage of emotions and questions of what is to come.

Though Tuesday marked the last meeting of the conciliation committee, it also marked the beginning of the conciliation process, said committee chairwoman Radious Guess.

Guess said it was up to the individual committee members — especially the religious leaders — to take the conciliation message back to the community.

Mayor Mike Johanns said he realized some committee members felt the committee did not reach its goal. But the committee had brought people to the table, he said, and had started dialogue within the community.

The Rev. Andrew Rollins from the Progressive Ministerial Alliance said committee members had to be honest with themselves before they reached any type of solution.

"We've got to recognize that none of us see the whole truth," he said. "The police recognize that they don't even have the truth."

Rollins said reform was the key to a solution, but the Rev. Andy Hird, who attended the meeting as a community member, said he had a different answer.

"You can't reform corruption," he said. "We need a spiritual revolution."

In order for the conciliation committee to reach the community, he said, it had to pay attention to it and meet as human beings, not as members of racial, ethnic or class groups.

Other community members spoke out at the final meeting and expressed discontent with what they said the group had failed to accomplish.

Cynthia Beliford approached the microphone with her hands on her hips.

"You guys are going nowhere," she said, choking back tears. "You can't discuss things from a middle-class standard. You have to get off your butts and do something."

Guess said the next step involved a subcommittee of the Mayor's Multicultural Advisory Committee, which would review the notes from the conciliation meetings and write up a report.

The report will be sent to members of the conciliation committee, and final recommendations will be sent to the mayor for implementation.

"We have to change the way we operate or we will become obsolete," Smith said.

Smith also addressed re-engineering teaching in the classroom. He said he did not support increasing faculty productivity because that meant faculty members would have to teach more classes.

"Instead, we have to increase the learning environment," he said.

Lecturing is not productive and is an old way to teach, but that is how most classes at NU are taught, he said.

"There are other ways to interact with students," he said.

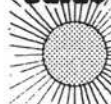

In other business, Chancellor Graham Spanier said goodbye to the Academic Senate. He said UNL was fortunate to have the senate, because it served the university well.

"There is a high level of cooperation between faculty and administration," he said.

The senate gave the chancellor farewell gifts. "This is the first chancellor in recent years that attends on a regular basis," said Academic Senate President Fred Choobineh.

Two motions were passed at the meeting. A new suspension procedure for faculty and staff was passed, and a new bylaw for the senate was added.
