FBI investigates Unabomber's ties

By JAMES ROWLEY
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) - The FBI says it has contacted dozens of professors at universities nationwide where the elusive terrorist known as Unabomber may have studied before he began a 17-year string of deadly bombings.

To help identify the anonymous bomber, investigators are asking professors nationwide but particularly in the Chicago area, Salt Lake City and northern California to examine the Unabomber's 35,000-word "manifesto" to see if it was written by a former student, the FBI said in a statement.

"The FBI is taking this investigative step in an effort to determine whether that community might recognize the writer's work or be able to shed light on important or telltale aspects of the manuscript's general topic, the history of science," FBI Director Louis Freeh said in a statement.

FBI investigators now believe the bomber may have taken science history classes at campuses in the Chicago area, Salt Lake City area and northern California, the FBI said.

The FBI said investigators are certain that the suspect was either enrolled at institutions in these areas or had some other ties to the universities. The FBI said it was also investigating the possibility that the suspect had "some contact" with universities and colleges elsewhere in the country.

The manuscript is a learned treatise against technology, and many of the professors mailed copies of it by the FBI are science historians.

The FBI said the document has enabled them to trace a pattern of academic involvement by the serial bomber. Since 1978, the Unabomber is believed by authorities to have planted 16 bombs killing three people and injuring 23 others.

"The UNABOMB Task Force said it appears the bomber was exposed to the history of science or similar academic disciplines in the late 1970s in the Chicago area, possibly at Northwestern University or the University of Illinois Circle Campus," the FBI said.

"There are indications the bomber continued his education, formally or informally, in the Salt Lake City area in 1980 and 1981," the bureau's statement said.
