games for the Huskers, while Phillips has been suspended from the team indefinitely.

Any athlete's family background must be examined, Brown said, before discipline can be administered when an athlete gets in trouble.

"If we kick a guy off the football team, where does he go?" Brown asked. "Where does he end up? Does he have Mom and Dad to go home to? Does he have a love and support network to go to?"

Most parents would not kick their own children out of the house if the child was in trouble, Brown said. It was unreasonable for fans to want the Huskers to do the same to their athletes.

"There is a moral fabric in each young man that we're trying to instill, the difference between right and wrong," Brown said. "We're not just going to let people get away with anything."

Brown said many people outside football had misconceived notions about football players. He said many players on this year's team were people anybody would feel comfortable around.

"These just aren't gladiators on Saturday afternoon who show up and perform to the delight of 76,000 people," Brown said. "These are young men who are so impressionable, and perhaps we're the last line of defense they have."
